EXPLANATION

THE object in view in preparing Corpus Juris Secundum has been two-fold: First, to provide a complete encyclopedic treatment of the whole body of the law, which means that it must be based upon all the reported cases; Second, to present each title of the law in form and content most suitable as a means of practical reference for the Bench and Bar.

Corpus Juris Secundum is therefore a complete restatement of the entire body of American Law. The clear-cut and exhaustive propositions comprising the text are supported by all the authorities from the earliest times to date. The supporting case citations, conspicuously set out in the notes, point to all decisions handed down since the publication of Corpus Juris. When the searcher may wish to consult earlier authorities, a specific reference to Corpus Juris makes available all cases back to 1658.

Each title is preceded by a complete section analysis, greatly simplified to facilitate research. Where the scope of any section is such as to require it, a more minute analysis is found thereunder in its appropriate place within the title (see Abatement and Revival, Section 112). The convenience of this method—an innovation in encyclopedic writing—must immediately commend itself.

A concise black-letter summary, indicative of its scope, precedes the full treatment or statement of the law under each section. These introductory summaries, concise and free from interlineation of authorities, have proven of great convenience and value in legal research.

An index is found in the back of each volume covering the titles contained therein, thus providing another convenient means of ready access to the text and notes.

Corpus Juris Secundum is kept to date by means of annual cumulative pocket parts for each volume. This feature of supplementation which has proved so successful in modern digests and statutes conveniently, and with certainty, keeps each title constantly to date through current cases and new precedents.

Corpus Juris Secundum represents the combined products of the highest editorial talent and manufacturing skill. Its many excellent editorial features are fittingly accompanied by corresponding innovations and improvements in mechanical arrangement, typography, and design, which the publisher believes will commend themselves to the profession as representing a new standard in legal publications.

ASSISTANCE. As judged by common usage, the word pertains to some kind of services rendered;[1] and has been defined as act of assisting, help, aid, furtherance, succor, support;[2] aid.[3] In particular connections, it has been also defined as assistants;[4] and benefit;[5] and has been distinguished from "advice" (see Advice 2 C.J.S p 892 note 55), and "supersession."[6]

Phrases: "Ability to provide such assistance,"[7] "aid and assistance" (see Aid 3 C J S. p 502 note 13), "assistance, affection, and companionship,"[8] "assistance . . . in the preparation and execution of the necessary papers,"[9] "assistance of every kind employed,"[10] "charitable assistance and benefit,"[11] "poor person in need of assistance,"[12] "receiving aid, advice, or assistance" (see Aid 3 C.J S p 502 note 21), "special assistance,"[13] and "without the assistance of her husband."[14]

2. Webster D, quoted in Sowle v Sowle, 215 N W 122, 123, 115 Neb 795

3. Wiley v McRee, 47 N C 349, 351. 351

4. Employment of assistance
In a statute authorizing a public officer to employ such assistance as might be necessary, the word "assistance" was evidently intended to mean the same thing as assistants — Ray v. James, (Ky.) 112 S W. 641, 642.

5. Tappan's App, 52 Conn 412, 416

6. People v Hayne, 23 P 1, 3, 83 Cal 111, 17 Am S R 211, 7 L R A. 348

7. Peabody v Town of Holland, 178 A 888, 889, 107 Vt 237, 98 A.L R 866

8. Loss of husband's assistance, affection and companionship

Preparation of papers not required
Under the statute limiting fee for "assistance in the preparation of the necessary papers" in presentation of a claim to the United States Veterans' Administration, the quoted term, "does not mean that the defendant prepared all of the papers, or that he necessarily prepared any of the papers If he gave his assistance in such preparation and execution, that is all that is required"—Negron v U S, (C C A.Porto Rico) 30 F (2d) 584, 585

Under a statute providing for the relief of any "poor person in need of assistance," absolute destitution is unnecessary, since "assistance" implies that the needy person may be able to bear some of the expense of his support An injured person who was in urgent need of a doctor's services and who had no money or tangible property or resources that could be made available soon enough to do him any good was prima facie a "poor person in need of assistance," though he had a bonus and federal insurance policy on which loan might be obtained — Peabody v. 14. Administration of paraphernal property
A statute providing that a wife has the right to administer personally her paraphernal property "without the assistance of her husband" means without his control, without the necessity of being thereunto authorized by him. It is not incompatible with her personal administration that she should avail herself of the assistance of her husband, if he is willing to render it, provided he act under her authority and merely as her proclaimed agent.—Miller v. Handy, 33 La.Ann. 160.

§ 1. Definition, Nature, Origin, and Status of Writ

A writ of assistance is a process by which an equity court enforces its decrees respecting the title or right to possession of land; the basis of the writ is the power of the court to give effect to its adjudications without resort to other titles and it has been a recognized device for attaining this end for many years.

A writ of assistance, in modern American practice, is a form of process issued by a court of equity to transfer the possession of property, and more specifically of lands, the title or right to which it has previously adjudicated, as a means of enforcing its decree,[1] and is the ordinary process used by a court of chancery to put a party, receiver, sequestrator, or other person into possession of property when he is entitled thereto, either upon a decree or upon an interlocutory order,[2] the equitable equivalent to the writ of possession which issues at law—the writ of habere facias possessionem.[3] Another form of process, issuing from the court of exchequer and similarly designated, which in one aspect was of frequent and oppressive use in the collection of revenue in the colonial period in this country has never been adopted by the states or the United States[4] so that no useful purpose would be served by defining it or hereafter considering it and accordingly this title is limited in scope to the equity process first mentioned.

The writ is of remote origin, dating as far back as the reign of Henry VIII.[5] In the jurisprudence of this country, it has long been available to courts of equity,[6] the power to issue it existing independently of statute[7] although confirmed in some jurisdictions, at least inferentially, by general statutes with reference to the issuance of writs.[8]

The basic concept upon which the right to issue the writ is predicated is that of the power of a court of equity to enforce its decrees;[9] it is derived from the principle that the court's jurisdiction to enforce is coextensive with its jurisdiction to determine the rights of the parties to the suit[10] and is a device whereby the court is enabled to avoid the necessity of turning the party entitled over to a court of law for the effectual protection of the rights decreed to him.[11]

§ 2. Propriety of Writ in General

a. Discretionary character
b. Prior adjudication of right
c. Pendency of other proceedings

a. Discretionary Character

Except where the applicant's right is manifest, the writ is discretionary in character and should issue only when the right thereto is clearly established.

Ordinarily the relief sought by way of writ of assistance is addressed to the sound discretion of, and the issuance of the writ is largely discretionary with, the court.[12] It should be granted, however, only where the right of the applicant seeking the writ is clear; and, if it is doubtful, should be denied.[13] It may be used only when there is no equity or appearance of equity in defendant[14] and the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should satisfy itself that the applicant who comes seeking equity has done equity and deny the writ if his conduct is marked by fraud or unfair dealing.[15]

Nevertheless, the rule that issuance of the writ is discretionary is subject to the limitation that, where there is no ground for the discretionary withholding of the right, the writ issues ex debito justitiæ, and is as much a matter of course as an execution after judgment at law.[16]

b. Prior Adjudication of Right

A proper occasion arises for employment of the writ when the court has determined the rights and claims as between the parties by a prior valid decree which is final and binding upon the parties to be affected.

A proceeding for a writ presupposes that the rights of the parties are such as follow upon final decree.[17] Accordingly, the writ is properly employed wherever a court of equity, having jurisdic-

The statutory proceeding to require removal from a certificate of land title of a memorial of encumbrance not being a substitute for the action of ejectment or other possessory action and not purporting to provide a summary mode of placing the title holder in possession of his premises, a demurrer to a petition in such proceeding while it may admit the allegations as to title does not afford a sufficient basis for the issuance of a writ of assistance—Purchase v. Village of Desplaines, 155 N.E. 753, 324 Ill. 534.

tion of the persons and property in controversy, has determined the rights of the litigants to the title or possession of real estate,[18] or has decreed or confirmed a sale of the property,[19] and may issue as properly for a defendant successfully maintaining a cross bill as for a plaintiff[20]

The decree and the sale and proceedings thereunder must, however, be beyond suspicion, being insufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ if so tainted with irregularity or error as to create a doubt of their validity;[21] furthermore the rights of the respective parties must have been fully and finally adjudicated in the principal suit.[22] A decree or order which is a nullity[23] or one which does not dispose of the case on the merits[24] is incapable of supporting an application for, or issuance of, the writ.

The most familiar instance of the use of the writ is where land has been sold under a decree foreclosing a mortgage, a situation considered in detail in Mortgages § 770 [42 C.J. p 272 notes 61-68]; the writ is not limited to such cases, however, but extends to all actions brought for the determination of the rights of the parties to the title or possession of realty after a judgment declaring such rights,[25] the limitation recognized by some authority to cases where the underlying decree is one which passes the title[26] has elsewhere been expressly rejected.[27]

c. Pendency of Other Proceedings

The institution of other proceedings, such as forcible entry and detainer or ejectment, having the same object, does not prevent a resort to the writ as a means of obtaining possession.

The remedies given by writ of assistance and by forcible entry and detainer are concurrent, and both may be pursued at the same time until a satisfaction is had, the institution of the detainer action not sufficing to oust the chancery court of its jurisdiction in the cause;[28] and in like manner the commencement of an action of ejectment is not sufficient to bar the court from enforcing its decree by means of a writ of assistance.[29]

§ 3. Persons Entitled to Writ

The purchaser, his assigns or grantees, as well as the party to the suit, may claim the issuance of the writ, subject to the discretionary powers of the court.

While a few early cases took the view that the writ could not be regularly issued at the instance of anyone except a party to the action in which the underlying decree was entered,[30] it is well settled that the purchaser under a decree for sale is entitled to the writ even though a stranger to the record,[31] and by the weight of authority it will issue in favor of the purchaser's assignee or grantee,[32] except where it appears that by granting the writ injustice will be done to the party in possession,[33] for, of course, upon this factor, as upon others generally, whether the writ shall issue or not is a matter addressed to the sound judicial discretion of the judge [34]

Where a purchaser went into possession of land under a deed from his vendor before its sale on a foreclosure proceeding and before such suit was pending, and was dispossessed by a writ to the sheriff in that proceeding to which he was not a party, it was held that a petition by such purchaser for a writ of assistance to restore him to the possession of the land should be granted [35]

§ 4. Against Whom Writ May Issue

a In general
b Entrants pending suit

a. In General

A writ of assistance issues against those persons bound by the decree and also against any who have no bona fide colorable claim to possession, and against them only.

The writ of assistance will issue against a party to the suit,[36] his representatives[37] or privies,[38] or third persons generally holding through, or coming into possession under, him[39] pendente lite[40] or after a sale of the premises,[41] or against any person who holds possession as a mere intruder or trespasser;[42] and as a rule against such persons only.[43]

As otherwise stated, it issues against, and operates on, those persons, and those only, whose rights have been determined by the judgment or decree [44] Whenever the person whose possession is sought to be ousted by the writ sets up a bona fide and colorable claim of right to possession, the writ will be refused[45] and so will not issue against persons in possession before suit who were not made parties, provided they claim under an independent claim of ownership not concluded by the decree,[46] or persons who have acquired a new and independent right or title to the property, or make a prima facie showing to that effect.[47]

However, while it is not required that claimant establish the validity of his title in resisting the application,[48] where the issuance of the writ is contested on the ground of the right to possession of the person against whom it is sought, the claim of possession must be colorable or reasonable, not frivolous, collusive, or unsupported [49]

Moreover it will not issue against a sheriff merely because he has failed to execute a writ of possession [50]

b. Entrants pending Suit

Persons entering during the pendency of the suit under those concluded by the decree therein hold subject to be dispossessed by writ of assistance if they take with actual or constructive notice of the suit.

Clearly one entering under the party against whom the decree is entered takes subject to be dispossessed by a writ of assistance where a lis pendens is duly filed of record before his entry on the property[51] or where he has actual notice of the litigation,[52] but as against an entrant having no notice, actual or constructive, of the pendency of the suit, the writ may not issue.[53]

§ 5. Property Subject to Writ

Typically the writ relates to the possession of real property but, it would seem, not necessarily so.

Although the writ is ordinarily defined with express reference to real property and in application is used almost always to recover possession of that class of property as clearly appears from an examination of the authorities cited throughout this Title, it has been said to be available to compel the delivery of either personal property or realty.[54] Indeed the writ may in some cases be an appropriate remedy although the decree to be enforced thereby has nothing to do with the possession of any kind, but merely commands the specific performance of particular acts.[55]

§ 6. Proceedings to Procure Writ

An application for a writ of assistance is a summary interlocutory proceeding supplementary to the proceeding in which the decree as to the right to the property was rendered. In modern practice great liberality of procedure prevails, the formalities at one time required being largely dispensed with.

An application for a writ of assistance is a summary[56] interlocutory[57] proceeding; it is not the institution of a new suit but is simply another step in the equity suit in which title has been adjudicated, being a part of the process used in enforcing the decree itself.[58]

Under the early practice in this country, the court, on examination and after satisfying itself that possession was being withheld by some one concluded by the decree, made a decretal order that the possession be delivered to the person entitled, unless the decree itself directed that he should be put in possession, which order was served on the terre-tenant accompanied with a demand for possession, and at times with a formal writ of execution of the order for possession; the order for possession, not being complied with upon demand was then followed by an attachment, which was largely a matter of form, and was seldom served and could be dispensed with; after that there followed an order for an injunction commanding the party in possession forthwith to deliver it up, which order issued, of course, on affidavit proving the previous steps; and then, on affidavit of service of the injunction and refusal, a writ of assistance to the sheriff to put the party in possession issued of course on motion without notice.[59] The modern tendency of the courts is to dispense with the formalities mentioned, however, and to issue the writ immediately on a showing of a refusal of the tenant to surrender possession upon demand.[60] Upon a decree being rendered in his favor, applicant may obtain the writ without pursuing the complex procedure of the earlier practice of filing a supplemental petition or other proper application setting forth facts showing the necessity for the writ and petitioner's right thereto, and praying that the writ may issue,[61] indeed, the court's action in awarding the writ at the time of and as a part of an order confirming a sale has been upheld.[62]

Requirements as to confirmation of the decree, demand and refusal of possession, or the like, imposed by applicable statutes or rules of court or by the terms of the decree, expressly or by reasonable implication, constitute conditions precedent to the issuance of the writ, subject to a waiver thereof by the occupant.

Sometimes by virtue of statute or rules of court the recordation on the minutes of the court of the decree in aid of which a writ of assistance is sought,[63] or a demand and refusal of possession,[64] is a condition precedent to the issuance of the writ; and the decree itself often states conditions to be fulfilled before the writ may issue, all of which must, of course, be fully satisfied, in consequence of which a final decree of confirmation of sale of the premises,[65] the presentation or exhibition to the occupant of the commissioner's deed,[66] and a demand of possession[67] have at times been recognized as requirements to be met before the writ may issue Moreover, even though the decree does not in terms require a demand and refusal, if other requirements from which such conditions may reasonably be implied are imposed, they have been deemed to render those circumstances necessary conditions before the writ may issue.[68]

However where, the decree itself unconditionally settles the right to the possession of land, the award of a writ of assistance need not be postponed until after delivery of possession by defendant has been demanded or refused;[69] and in the absence of such a requirement in the statutes or rules of court, or in the terms of the decree, prior confirmation of the sale is not a condition precedent to the issuance of the writ.[70]

Where a demand is necessary, it must not be made prematurely but is effective only as a satisfaction of the requirement if made at a time when demandant is entitled to the possession of the land.[71] A demand made upon the agents of the occupant who are in possession of the premises for him is sufficient.[72]

The decision of the court to grant the writ after hearing and notice has been held equivalent to a confirmation, if that is necessary;[73] and where the application alleges that the order of confirmation was exhibited to the occupant, and there was such an order in existence at the date alleged, the issuance of the writ is not to be regarded as premature merely because such order was issued on that very date, where no showing is made in contradiction of the allegation.[74]

By an unqualified refusal to deliver possession on demand, the occupant may waive the requirement that a copy of the decree be exhibited to him.[75]

§ 8. —— Time of Issuance

If a period is prescribed during which the rights under the decree remain defeasible, that period must have expired before the writ may issue.

The issuance of the writ of assistance does not immediately follow the decree adjudicating the rights of the parties in cases where those rights are not finally and irrevocably fixed at the time of the decree; if by the rules of law or the terms of the decree the rights decreed remain defeasible for a specified period, such as a period of redemption, that period must intervene before the writ may be claimed.[76]

§ 9. —— Defenses

a. Delay
b. Matters affecting decree or title

a. Delay

The applicant, by failing to make timely application for the writ, may disentitle himself thereto where such failure tends to affect or change the rights or status of the parties, and in like manner the person in possession by failing to urge defenses promptly and in due course may lose the right to assert them; but mere delay will not of itself constitute a defense to the application.

Delay in proceeding to enforce the decree by application for writ of assistance, or to comply with the conditions thereby imposed on applicant, is not of itself sufficient to establish a waiver of the right to the writ;[77] nor does it make out an estoppel, in the face of a lack of any showing of the element of justifiable reliance essential to that defense.[78] While the right to the writ may be lost by laches,[79]

mere delay in applying for the writ does not of itself constitute a defense where it does not appear that any right adverse to applicant accrued during the delay or is attributable thereto,[80] the question of what constitutes laches being for the sound discretion of the court[81] and the writ being subject to be withheld only where it is made to appear that rights have arisen or been changed by reason of some subsequent agreement or happening making it likely that issuance will work an injustice.[82]

The trial court's action in granting a writ of assistance to enforce its decree will not be reversed because of a prior foreclosure entitling the person in possession to such possession, where, being a party, he stood by without apprising the court of the foreclosure or objecting to the writ of assistance, but permitted the court to treat such mortgage as an existing prior lien, the granting of the writ not affecting the validity of such foreclosure, and the occupant being estopped to inject the issue of the prior foreclosure at the time he attempted to set it up.[83]

b. Matters Affecting Decree or Title

Matters which were, or should have been, adjudicated by the decree or which affect the regularity of deeds or returns thereunder may not be urged in opposition to the writ; but jurisdictional questions and assertions of new title may properly be raised by way of defense.

Nothing can be received as a defense to an application for a writ of assistance to affect the decree in aid of which the writ is asked, defendant, his representatives, and those claiming under him being concluded on the merits;[84] and the court will consider the decree as finally adjudicating, not only such matters as were actually determined in the suit in which the decree was rendered, but also such matters as should have been presented there for determination.[85] This rule, however, does not preclude inquiry as to the jurisdiction of the court in the original cause.[86]

The regularity of the commissioner's action in connection with execution of the deed and return of sale cannot be collaterally attacked upon an application for a writ of assistance and the commissioner will not be permitted to impeach his return or his deed.[87]

One against whom the writ is prayed may set up as a defense to its issuance a paramount title acquired by him which has not been adjudicated.[88]

§ 10. —— Jurisdiction to Issue

The writ may issue from, and only from, a court possessing original jurisdiction in equity, which must also be that court wherein the underlying decree was rendered.

The jurisdiction to issue writs of assistance is one which appertains to, and has long been exercised by, courts of chancery or any courts possessing equitable jurisdiction;[89] indeed the writ can issue only from such a court,[90] the principal distinction between a writ of assistance and a writ of possession being that the former issues from a court of equity and the latter from a court of law.[91] Courts or judicial officers of limited jurisdiction, on whom no equitable powers have been bestowed, may not grant an order for a writ of assistance.[92]

The writ, being but the execution of the final decree, can issue only from the court in which the final judgment or decree was rendered.[93] Thus in an appealed case the application should be addressed to, and the writ issued by, the court a quo, not the appellate court.[94]

A court of general original jurisdiction which reviews and affirms an order granting the writ, made by an inferior court of limited jurisdiction in excess of authority, does not thereby cure the fatal jurisdictional defect, either on the theory that it has validated the order below or that it has itself issued the writ, although the reviewing court is jurisdictionally competent to issue such writ in an original proceeding, at least where the appeal is only from the order and none is taken from the underlying decree.[95] A writ of assistance being concerned only with the possession of the property, the court has no jurisdiction to try title to the property under a petition for the writ.[96]

While the better practice requires that notice of the application for the writ be given, an omission to do so is generally not regarded as fatal, and, even where the giving of notice is a definite requirement, constructive notice may suffice.

The better practice requires that notice of the application for the writ should be given in all cases,[97] particularly where the person in possession was not a party to the suit,[98] and there is some authority treating notice as necessary,[99] the reason adduced in support of the giving of notice is that the rights of the parties may have changed by reason of agreement or circumstances arising between rendition of the judgment and the application for the writ.[1]

However, the giving of notice is not ordinarily regarded as an absolute requirement which must be complied with as a condition to the validity of the process.[2] The terms of the decree may be such as to dispense with any necessity of notice of the application,[3] it being proper, and indeed even usual and advisable, for the purpose of avoiding delay in procuring the writ, that the decree include a provision that it may issue without further notice.[4] The trial court may require notice to the occupant of the property, or not, as in its judgment may seem best in the particular case, if there is no statute particularly prescribing it.[5]

Even though the requirement of notice is recognized, the constructive notice which parties to a suit have of all motions, orders, or decrees in a pending cause is sufficient where the motion for the writ is made at the same term of court as the decree, to which the person in possession is a party, and relieves the movant from any necessity of giving actual notice in such a case.[6]

§ 12. —— Application

a. In general
b. Amendment

a. In General

An application, by petition or otherwise, setting forth the substantial grounds and circumstances authorizing issuance is the regular manner in which the writ is sought.

Incorporation of a provision in the decree for a writ of assistance without further application to the court has been approved;[7] but elsewhere it has been said to be the proper, if not the necessary, procedure to make separate application for the writ and not to dispose of the matter in the decree.[8]

The application need not be by way of separate petition specially claiming the writ but may be made by motion, where the person in possession has notice of all material facts and steps in the proceedings,[9] or as a part of a petition asking not only for the issuance of the writ but for other matters as well, such as confirmation of a sale.[10]

The petition or other application should set forth facts showing the necessity for the writ, and all the material conditions and circumstances establishing the applicant's right thereto.[11] It need not, however, allege with particularity immaterial details as to the manner of performance of such conditions,[12] and merely formal irregularities or defects incapable of affecting substantially the rights of the parties will not invalidate it.[13]

b. Amendment

An amendment of the application which will result in retaining part of the case in equity and sending part to law is not favored.

The courts are inclined to view with disfavor a request to permit petitioner to amend his petition where the effect of the amendment would be to retain a part of the proceeding in equity while remitting another part to a law court.[15]

§ 13. —— Hearing

a. Scope
b. Answer and replication
c. Conduct in general
d. Evidence

a. Scope

All that will be considered in passing on an application for a writ of assistance is whether the applicant is entitled to be put in possession under the decree; no questions of title or of the ultimate right to possession are involved.

Upon an application for a writ of assistance, no question determined by the original decree can be litigated[16] nor can the original case be reviewed or the decree therein be modified.[17] The legal or equitable title will not be tried or adjudicated.[18] The sole question to be determined on the motion is whether applicant has a right, as against the party in possession, to use the writ to obtain possession.[19] In the absence of any claim of an independent paramount title, the only question on such application is whether the decree has or has not been complied with.[20]

Furthermore, the proceeding for the writ is not an appropriate one in which to try causes of action against applicant for the breach of collateral undertakings or contracts for which adequate relief is obtainable in another forum.[21]

b. Answer and Replication

The answer to the application and the reply thereto must be sufficient in form and in substance to controvert the substantial allegations of the pleadings which they respectively oppose.

An answer to a petition that the writ issue should set forth clearly and distinctly the facts, if any, which constitute a defense so that they may be understood by the opposite party and by the court.[22] If it fails to set up clearly and fully rights and claims of such character as constitute proper matter of defense to the application, it may be disregarded.[23] Moreover, objections to the issuance of the writ must be made in some manner sufficiently formal to bring them to the cognizance of the court, in the absence of a waiver, a mere oral statement of claim or allusion thereto by way of argument not being enough.[24]

There is some authority sanctioning the view that if the tenant puts in an answer setting up a defense, and no replication is filed, the facts set up by way of defense must be taken as true,[25] while tled in the names of both defendants is a mere technicality, especially where it is not clear from the record whether the order of discontinuance has been entered.—Howe v. Lemon, 11 N.W. 379, 47 Mich. 544

Admitted inability to disprove affidavit

Where the occupant of premises after foreclosure made an affidavit in opposition to a petition for a writ of assistance, setting forth the facts upon which his resistance to the writ was founded, and petitioner did not object to the affidavit in form, but consented to treat it as an answer, and admitted that he could not successfully deny the facts therein stated, the facts stated in the affidavit must be regarded by the court as true.—U.S Presbyterian Church Bd of Home Missions v Davis, 62 A. 447, 70 N.J.Eq 577, affirmed 65 A. 1117, 71 N.J.Eq. 788.

elsewhere the contrary view is taken, under prevailing rules of practice and pleading, that allegations of matters of defense are deemed to be denied upon a failure to file a reply,[26] but in any event where the petitioner does file a reply, denying specifically the allegations of the answer and the new matter set forth therein, they cannot be taken as true either absolutely or prima facie[27]

c. Conduct in General

The parties are entitled to be heard on the application, and the court may receive and consider oral testimony; but there is no right to a jury trial or to special findings.

The court may properly hear and consider oral testimony in passing on the application for a writ of assistance;[28] and, where allegations of an independent right are controverted, the court is under the duty of proceeding to hear testimony at least to establish prima facie the existence of the right asserted and cannot properly dismiss the application for a writ on the pleadings[29]

The parties to such a proceeding are not entitled to a jury trial[30] nor to a special finding of facts[31]

d. Evidence

To render evidence admissible on the hearing, it must be relevant under the pleadings and a proper preliminary foundation must be laid. It must be sufficient to sustain the exercise of a sound judicial discretion but will be aided by the making of reasonable inferences

Before the sheriff's deed is admissible in evidence in a proceeding for a writ of assistance by a purchaser, he must first lay a proper foundation for its admission by producing the judgment and execution to establish the validity and terms thereof.[32] Under an allegation that applicant "demanded" possession of the property, which was refused, evidence that the sheriff's certificate of sale was exhibited at the time demand was made is admissible.[33]

Sufficiency. The showing in support of an independent right or claim urged in opposition to the motion should be sufficient to call for the exercise of a judicial discretion;[34] mere allegations of new or independent title in respondent's answer are not sufficient as even a prima facie showing and do not justify refusal of the writ, at least where such allegations are controverted,[35] and, where the case made by the applicant's controverting affidavits is stronger than that made by the affidavits supporting the claim, issuance of the writ is proper.[36]

A showing of possession at the time of the decree and of a refusal to surrender it on demand coupled with the fact of application for the writ and resistance thereto on other grounds sufficiently sustains a finding that the party against whom it issues remains in possession at the time of issuance, there being no affirmative showing made that it has been delivered to applicant.[37]

§ 14. —— Issuance, Form, and Requisites

a. In general
b. Formal irregularities
c Supporting evidence or findings

a. In General

The writ may be issued by the clerk without an order or by the court in chambers or in vacation only where that is authorized by statute or rule of court.

By virtue of statutes or rules of court in some jurisdictions it has been held that a writ of assistance may be issued by the clerk of court without any order therefor issued by the court;[38] but this applies only as between parties to the suit, an order being necessary as against one not a party.[39] In the absence of any such provision by rule or statute there must, before the writ can issue, be a judicial investigation ascertaining the facts justifying such writ,[40] the issuance is a judicial act, not one merely ministerial, and so is not performable by the clerk on his own authority without any order to that effect by the court,[41] and this is so although the decree contains a provision for the surrender of the premises, with or without an alternative provision that in default of surrender the writ may issue.[42] Indeed, the view has been expressed that a provision in the decree directing the clerk to issue the writ on the application of plaintiff without further order of the court is improper[43] and that a decree, providing that, on default in surrendering possession, a writ of assistance may issue in accordance with the practice of the court, gives no right to the writ without further action by the court,[44] although elsewhere, as set forth above in section 11 of this Title, such a provision is regarded as not only proper, but even advisable, as a means of expediting the issuance of the writ.

Similarly, statutes respecting the powers of courts, particularly with respect to process, are sometimes sufficiently broad to sustain a construction authorizing the issuance of writs of assistance by the judge in chambers or in vacation;[45] but in the absence of statute they may not be thus issued.[46]

b. Formal Irregularities

Formal irregularities in the writ do not survive an attack upon it on the merits.

Mere amendable irregularities in the form of the writ, as, for example, the omission of the seal of the court, are waived by appearance and an attack of the writ on the merits.[47]

c. Supporting Evidence or Findings

An order granting the writ must be supported by findings of fact or by a preservation of the evidence in the manner required by law.

The order granting the writ must contain a sufficient recital of specific facts to sustain it or must preserve the evidence in support of the writ, pursuant to general rules applicable to chancery decrees.[48]

§ 15. —— Alias Writ

An alias writ may not be issued where the return discloses a completed execution under the original, but where it fails to do so issuance of an alias writ is proper

It has been doubted whether an alias writ can be issued where the original writ has been once returned executed, on the ground that by the execution and return of the original the decree is satisfied and the court in which it was rendered loses control of the same.[49]

However, an alias writ may properly issue, where the return of the first writ does not disclose clearly that it has been fully executed, and it is made to appear by affidavit that it has not been;[50] and, a fortiori, such issuance is proper where the return affirmatively discloses the omission of an act or element essential to execution.[51]

The adjudication on the prior application is conclusive as to the right to possession when an alias writ is applied for, at least where the person in possession sets up substantially the same defense as on the former occasion.[52]

§ 16. Execution of Writ

a. In general
b. Restraining execution

a. In General

Immediately upon delivery of the writ to the proper officer for execution, he should execute it by entry on and delivery of the premises; it may be executed as against any person against whom it might have issued.

Immediately upon receiving the writ, the sheriff has the right and duty forthwith to serve and execute such process[53] and may enter upon and take possession of the premises, expelling and excluding therefrom everyone not possessing or presenting a colorable claim to an unadjudicated independent title, and employing such force as may be reasonably necessary for that purpose.[54] There is no effective execution of the writ where all that is done by the officer having that duty, by way of delivery to the persons entitled, is to send them a statement that the premises are vacant and are delivered to them as by law commanded; the law contemplates an effectual and not a merely formal delivery.[55]

Upon principles analogous to those governing as to persons against whom the writ may issue, it cannot lawfully be executed against a person in possession of the premises at the commencement of the action out of which it issued and who was not made a party to that action,[56] but may be executed not only against the parties defendant in the action out of which the writ arose, but also against all persons claiming by, through, or under them and against strangers and intruders.[57]

b. Restraining Execution

Possession is the criterion which determines whether persons claiming under unadjudicated rights may restrain execution of the writ.

If a person claiming title, who was not a party to the foreclosure suit, is in actual possession of the property sold, such possession may be protected upon motion to restrain the execution of the writ of assistance in favor of the purchaser;[58] but, if the claimant is not in possession, he cannot thus restrain execution of the writ.[59] It is for the court on the application to determine whether such claimant is in possession.[60]

a Of issuance or refusal of writ
b. Of execution of writ

a. Of Issuance or Refusal of Writ

The issuance of the writ is conclusive as to the jurisdiction of the court, the validity of the decree, and the propriety of the award, but questions of title and the ultimate right to possession are unaffected by grant or refusal of the writ and may be subsequently raised by appropriate proceedings.

The writ relates to, and operates upon, those rights only that have been determined by the judgment.[61] It cannot establish in the one party or destroy in the other any rights independent of those thus determined.[62] Nothing can be settled in such a proceeding so as to become res judicata between the litigant parties except the right to take possession of the property as a result of the suit, the questions of the maintenance of the possession after the whole function of the suit has been accomplished, and of title and the permanent right of possession, being left open and entirely unaffected by the adjudication on the motion;[63] the refusal of the writ is, like its issuance, not conclusive as to questions of title or right of possession, and constitutes no bar to a subsequent action of ejectment.[64]

This proposition is to be taken subject to the qualification noticed in discussing defenses available, in section 9, with reference to jurisdictional matters; as questions of lack of jurisdiction may be urged in opposition to the motion, one who has unsuccessfully attacked the court's jurisdiction to render the decree, in the proceeding for the writ, cannot assail the validity of the decree on that ground in a subsequent action or proceeding but is concluded in that respect, even though the matters urged against the jurisdiction are different from those formerly raised.[65]

Furthermore, while it remains in effect, the writ is, as between the parties to the decree and the application, a judicial determination of their rights and claims to possession, conclusive upon them until reversed, vacated, or set aside in appropriate proceedings; and the question of the propriety of its award will not be passed upon in a collateral action.[66]

b. Of Execution of Writ

Entry of the executing officer under the writ automatically terminates preexisting rights of entry and possession of persons concluded by it.

The moment the officer executing the writ goes on the premises for that purpose, all preëxisting rights of entry or possession theretofore held by persons concluded by the writ come to an end.[67]

§ 18. Vacation, New Trial, and Appeal and Error

The writ may and should be set aside on motion, and the person ousted restored to possession, upon a showing of matters establishing the impropriety of its issuance, which the movant is not estopped to assert.

If a writ of assistance is improperly issued or executed the trial court may, and should, on summary motion, set aside the writ or service and restore the possession,[68] as, for example, where the petitioner for vacation was neither a party, a purchaser pendente lite, nor a trespasser,[69] or where the writ was issued by the clerk without an order therefor, in excess of his authority.[70] Indeed, a motion to vacate is the only practicable redress available to the person in possession where the writ was granted ex parte[71] or where the person ousted is a stranger to the record.[72]

The order granting the writ should be set aside, however, only on a showing that it was improperly made;[73] and where the facts forming the basis of the claim for the motion to vacate rest solely on movant's information and belief, and are denied by applicant in the writ and the supporting papers show no reasonable probability that the movant's claim can be maintained, the motion is properly denied.[74] Matter which the person in possession would have been estopped, under the circumstances, to assert by way of defense to the application is not available after the award as a ground for vacating it.[75]

A motion to quash a writ of assistance issued in favor of a purchaser under a decree raises no issue as to matters litigated between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed.[76]

If the motion to vacate is granted and the writ of assistance set aside, the movant is entitled to be restored to possession of the premises by writ of restitution or other appropriate order or process.[77]

In the titles Appeal and Error and New Trial, the principles which have been applied as to appeals from grant or refusal of the writ and as to new trials are stated and developed.

ASSOCIATE.

As a Noun

One often in company with another, implying intimacy or equality; also one having an interest in common with another, as a confederate, a colleague in office; also one connected with an association or institution without the full rights or privileges of a regular member[50] While the word has among its meanings that of "partner," it does not indicate a partnership conclusively.[51] As frequently used in the plural, the word has been defined as meaning persons united, acting together by mutual consent, by compact, to the promotion of some common object;[52] and, when used in particular connections, has been said to be an ambiguous term, referring either to persons now acting with those named, or to persons who may hereafter come to be associates,[53] and to be read in connection with the legal principles involved in the case, its meaning not being extended to include a right in violation thereof.[54]

As a quasi judicial officer. An officer in each of the English courts of common law, appointed by the chief judge of the court, and holding his office during good behavior, whose duties were to superintend the entry of causes, to attend the sittings of nisi prius, and there receive and enter verdicts, and to draw up the posteas and any orders of nisi prius.[55]

Associates in office. Those who are united in action; who have a common purpose; who share the responsibility or authority and among whom is reasonable equality; those who are authorized by law to perform the duties jointly or as a body.[56]

Another phrase: "As your associate."[57]

As a Verb

To combine, join, or unite together.[58]

Phrases: "Associate with anyone in the plumbing business,"[59] and "such persons as he may associate with him,"[60] also "associated himself with,"[61] and "cars in such train which are associated together;"[62] and also "associating oneself with."[63]

ASSOCIATED PRESS. See Newspapers § 24 [46 C. J. p 42 note 70–p 45 note 41].

ASSOCIATIO. Law Latin, a joining or uniting with any person or thing.[64]

ASSOCIATION. It has been described as a word of vague meaning used to indicate a collection of persons who have joined together for a certain object;[65] also the persons so joining.[66] The term, both in its generic sense and as commonly used, is defined and distinguished from other terms in the title Associations § 1.

a. Definitions

An "association" is a body of persons acting together, without a charter, but upon the methods and forms used by corporations, for the prosecution of some common enterprise.

The term "association" does not have, in law, the fixed meaning accorded to "partnership" or "corporation,"[1] but is used to indicate a collection of persons who have united or joined together for some special purpose or business.[2] In other words, it signifies confederacy or union for particular purposes, good or ill.[3] In this sense it is a generic term, and may indifferently comprehend a voluntary confederacy, which is a partnership dissoluble by the persons who formed it, or a corporate confederacy, deriving its existence from a statute, and dissoluble only by the law.[4]

As the term is commonly used, however, an "association" may be defined to be a body of persons acting together, without a charter, but upon the methods and forms used by incorporated bodies, for the prosecution of some common enterprise.[5]

The term "association" is often used as synonymous with "company"[6] or "society."[7]

b. Nature and Status in General

An association may or may not constitute a legal entity in accordance with applicable provisions of local law.

In determining whether an association is an entity, a court of the forum will look to the state which created it,[8] and, where statutes are involved, the courts must look to the legislative intent to determine whether or not an association constitutes a legal entity.[9]

Under one view an association is regarded as a legal entity,[10] as where there are statutes, which will be considered in sections 35 and 36, providing that an association may sue or be sued as such,[11] although it is only as the association comes within the scope of the statute that it can be so recognized.[12]

As a general rule, however, and in the absence of applicable statutes to the contrary, it is held that an association is not a legal entity separate from the persons who compose it.[13]

It has been said that equity will look through the form to ascertain the real intent of an association of individuals, and will give effect to the real purposes of the organization in order to promote fair dealing and effectuate justice.[14]

Where the statutes of a state provide for and regulate business concerns of only two kinds—limited partnerships and corporations—associations doing business in such a state operate under the general laws of the land and not under statutory pro-

Mere creatures of contract

Unincorporated associations are mere creatures of contract freely formed at common law without any grant from the sovereign.—People v. Norwegian Underwriters, 247 N.Y S. 707, 711, 139 Misc. 70.

In the absence of legislation, a voluntary unincorporated association is not regarded by the law as a person or entity—Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Cook, (Tex Civ. App.) 221 S W. 1049, error refused.

tection and restrictions, as do limited partnerships and corporations [15]

c. Distinctions

(1) Corporations
(2) Joint stock companies
(3) Partnerships
(4) Trusts

(1) Corporations

While an association may in its broadest sense include a corporation, the two terms are ordinarily used to denote different conceptions, "association" ordinarily referring to an unincorporated society. The principal distinction lies in the fact that a corporation is a legal entity deriving its existence from franchise, whereas an association, in the narrower sense of the term, is a creature of contract without a legal entity separate from the individuals composing it.

The term "association" frequently enters into the names bestowed upon corporations by the legislature or chosen by the incorporators themselves, and in its broad sense it may include "corporation." So the term as employed in statutes is frequently held, by reason of the object and scope of the statutes, to include "corporation," or to be synonymous therewith [16]

Ordinarily, however, the two terms are employed to denote different and distinct conceptions; and the term "association" is generally used in a restricted sense as relating to unincorporated societies.[17] Statutes providing that an association may be sued as such, which will be considered in section 36, do not thereby convert an unincorporated association into a corporation.[18] Associations differ from corporations in many respects. The individuals composing an association act by virtue of a mere agency, as will be shown in subsequent sections, while a corporation acts in its own person.[19] As a rule, associations, unlike corporations, are not creatures of the state, have no power of perpetual succession, no right to use a common seal, cannot contract under a corporate name, and cannot take, hold, or dispose of property as a collective whole [20] A distinction which has been drawn by the courts is that, as shown in the preceding subsection, an association is ordinarily not a legal entity distinct from its component individuals, whereas a corporation is always and necessarily a distinct and separate legal entity [21]

In determining in any case whether or not an association authorized or recognized by statute is a corporation, regard is to be had to the powers and faculties bestowed on or possessed by the association rather than to the name given to it; associations having all the essential attributes of a corporation are corporations, even though they may be declared by the legislature not to be such, and associations not possessed of such attributes are not corporations, although they may be so called [22] Where no steps were taken to incorporate an association beyond the mere signing of articles of incorporation, the association has been held to be a voluntary unincorporated association.[23]

(2) Joint Stock Companies

While the word "association" may include a "joint stock company," the terms are ordinarily employed to denote different conceptions, as an association is ordinarily unable to issue stock or transferable memberships.

Construction of statute

"If an entity with legal individuality is created, it follows that this legal person possesses the ordinary corporate advantages, unless some appropriate legislative action expressly provides otherwise On the other hand, if a legal individuality is not created by the statute which affects the conduct of the enterprise in question, then the natural persons interested in the enterprise incur all the obligations and liabilities of common-law partners, except in so far as these are limited by statute or enforceable contracts"—Hall v Essner, (Ind) 193 N E 86, 89

23. Harris v Ashdown Potato Curing Ass'n, 284 S W. 755, 171 Ark. 399.

The term "association" may include "joint stock company,"[24] but it does not necessarily include that term,[25] and, strictly speaking, is not applicable thereto, since a voluntary association cannot issue stock, and the right of membership is not transferable, at least not without the consent of the association itself.[26]

(3) Partnerships

While an association may in a broad sense be characterized as a partnership, in its strict meaning it is distinguishable therefrom, as with respect to the effect of the death of a member as not working a dissolution of the association and the lack of power in an individual associate to bind his fellow associates.

It has been said that the word "association" is a generic term which may properly comprehend not only a corporation, as shown in the preceding subsection, but also a partnership,[27] and in a number of cases it has been broadly stated that an association, or one organized for business purposes, is essentially a partnership[28]

Strictly speaking, however, an unincorporated association is neither a partnership[29] nor, it has been said, a quasi partnership,[30] although it is rated as a partnership so far as its capacity to sue and to be sued is concerned[31] In any event, the members thereof, whatever may be their relation and liability to third persons dealing with the association, are not partners inter sese, since the bankruptcy, death, or retirement of a member does not of necessity work a dissolution of the association, and there exists no authority in a single member to bind the others[32]

This is especially true of associations which are not engaged in business enterprises and the objects of which do not contemplate profit and loss, but which are organized for moral, social, benevolent, literary, scientific, political, or other like purposes, or for the purpose of recreation or amusement.[33] As to these it is generally held that they are not partnerships, and that members are not partners,[34]

Associations, the objects of which are political rather than for purposes of trade or profit, are not partner-either as between the members themselves,[35] or as between a member and the association,[36] or as between members and third persons dealing with them or the association.[37] So no partnership exists between the members of an association organized to preserve the property of the community from destruction by fire,[38] or between members of an association of individuals or firms the objects of which are the mutual protection, benefit, and advancement of the interest of the association or its members,[39] mutual insurance,[40] avoiding competition between its members,[41] promoting business intercourse between members,[42] or to designate and maintain a uniform scale of prices and equitably to distribute work,[43] or to adopt a uniform basis of just and equitable dealings between the members of the association and their employees[44]

Where, however, the association is organized for commercial purposes, and operated for pecuniary profit, it is no more than a partnership, and the rights and liabilities incident to that relation attach to its members, as well between the members themselves,[45] as between a member and the association,[46] and as between members and third persons dealing with them or the association.[47]

strictly speaking, the two forms of organization are not identical.

While express trusts and voluntary associations established by written instruments may in some instances run into each other and have factors in common, the former may exist without the element of association between the beneficiaries,[50] and therein lies the distinction between an "association" and a "trust"[51]

§ 2. Statutory Provisions

Reasonable statutory regulations of associations are valid.

The courts have upheld the validity of statutes permitting suits to be maintained against an association for any cause of action upon which plaintiff therein could maintain suit against the members of the association,[52] or providing that jurisdiction may be acquired over an association doing business by service of process upon one or more of its members,[53] or upon specified officers of the association,[54] or that an action may be maintained by or against an association in its common or associate name,[55] or requiring certain associations to file a list of members with constitution and membership oath[56] A statute providing that an unincorporated association may be sued without naming the individual members, by service on an agent of the association, and that the property of individual members shall be liable for satisfaction of a judgment against the association has been upheld as valid[57]

The validity of statutes regulating the practice of law by associations will be considered in § 12 infra.

§ 3. Organization

In the absence of statutory provisions and under the general rule, the organization of unincorporated asso-

have power to make by-laws and have a common seal to sue and be sued, to receive and grant, and purchase and hold lands and chattels in the names of the trustees with perpetual succession, is an "association with the powers and privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals and partnerships," within Const. art 12 § 5, defining corporations.—State v. Secret societies

Under its police power, the state "may prescribe and apply to associations having an oath-bound membership any reasonable regulation calculated to confine their purposes and activities within limits which are consistent with the rights of others and the public welfare The requirement in section 53 [of the N.Y. Civil Rights Law] that each association shall file with the secretary of state a sworn copy of its constitution, oath of membership, etc, with a list of members and officers is such a regulation It proceeds on the twofold theory that the state within whose territory and under whose protection the association exists is entitled to be informed of its nature and purpose, of whom it is composed and by whom its activities are conducted, and that requiring this information to be supplied for the public files will operate as an effective or substantial deterrent from the violations of public and private right to which the association might be tempted if such a disclosure were not required. The requirement is not arbitrary or oppressive, but reasonable and likely to be of real effect. Of course, power to require the disclosure includes authority to prevent individual members of an association which has failed to comply from attending meetings or retaining membership with knowledge of its default"—People of State of New York ex rel. ciations rests upon the contract of the associates, usually embodied in a written instrument designated "constitution" or "articles of association." In some states there are statutes providing for organization of associations.

The organization of voluntary associations, unlike that of corporations, does not, as a rule, depend upon statutory provisions, but as to manner and effect is within the discretion of the associates,[58] who may combine for any lawful purpose.[59] They are generally formed by the voluntary association of individuals under the common-law right of contract.[60] The contract of association may properly be, and generally is, embodied in an instrument termed "articles of association" or "constitution,"[61] which, when duly adopted by the associates, governs the powers and rights, and duties and liabilities, of the association and its members, in correspondence to the charter of a corporation,[62] and apart from this contract of association, whatever its form, the association has no existence[63] and no powers, as will be considered in § 12 infra.

In some states general statutes have been enacted expressly authorizing individuals to unite, for prescribed purposes, as a voluntary association under a distinguishing associate name,[64] and, as will be shown in specific titles, statutes exist in some states providing for the organization of particular kinds of associations.

§ 4. Legality of Object

The objects of an association must be legal, although where the principal purposes of an association are lawful it will not be wholly defeated by reason of the illegality of other and separable purposes.

To render the organization effectual, the objects of the association must of course be lawful, an association formed to carry out an illegal purpose is a nullity.[65] Where, however, the main purposes of the association are legal, the organization is not wholly defeated by reason of the illegality of other separable purposes; and an association whose general objects are legal is not invalidated by reason of the fact that some of its rules are contrary to public policy, but if a material part of the rules of an association are illegal, and they cannot be eliminated without defeating the avowed objects of the association, the entire organization fails.[66]

If the expressed objects of an association are lawful, the association is not rendered an unlawful one by reason of the fact that its principal officer commits illegal acts in the course of his duties.[67]

§ 5. Estoppel to Deny Existence

Either an association doing business as a legal entity, or one dealing with it as such, may be estopped to deny the existence of the association.

An association in fact doing business as a legal entity may be estopped to deny its own existence;[68] and one who deals with an association as a legal entity capable of transacting business, and in consequence receives from it money or other things of value, is estopped from denying the legality of its existence.[69]

Reorganization of an association under a new name will not necessarily destroy the identity of the old organization, although where a substantial change takes place in connection with reorganization the old and the new may not be regarded as identical.

The reorganization of an association under a new name, with a partial change in the personnel of officers and members, will not necessarily destroy the identity of the old association, if the objects and purposes of the reorganized body are identical with those of the old.[70] So a subordinate society does not cease to exist because, by virtue of a change in the constitution of the parent society, its membership is changed by enlargement, and its methods of internal administration are altered, and accordingly it retains its property rights under the methods of administration.[71] Where, however, an association adopts a new constitution and a new name, elects new officers, changes the amount of dues, and transfers the assets of the old to the new association, the two associations are not identical, and hence members of the old association are not ipso facto members of the new.[72]

§ 7. Consolidation with Other Organization

Consolidation of an association with another amounts to a dissolution. A transfer of the members and property of one association to another to the extinguishment of the former cannot be effected by mere majority vote.

The amalgamation or consolidation of an association with another similar organization amounts practically to a disbandment and dissolution of the association.[73] A transfer of the members and property of the association to another similar organization to the extinguishment of the former cannot be effected by the vote of a mere majority,[74] especially where a quorum of the association seeks to maintain its existence.[75]

§ 8. Incorporation of Existing Association

An existing association may merge with or become a corporation under statutory or contractual authority, but not otherwise In the event of an ineffectual attempt to incorporate an association, the existence, property, and membership of the association remain distinct from any corporation which may be formed as a purported successor of such association.

In the absence of either statutory or contractual authority, an unincorporated association cannot change into a corporation.[76]

In some states statutes exist which authorize voluntary associations to become incorporated. If such a law is in existence when a voluntary association is formed, it must be deemed to be incorporated into the association agreement by necessary implication, and every member must be conclusively presumed to have impliedly agreed, in joining the association, that it might at any future time be converted into a corporation in accordance with the statutes regulating the matter.[77] In the absence of such a statute, or of some similar provision in the laws of the society, or of a resolution authorizing incorporation, neither the officers of an association,[78] nor any number of the members less than all,[79] nor a majority of the branches of an association,[80] nor a minority of the membership,[81] have or has power to incorporate the association; and if they proceed to do so without authority, equity will restrain them at the instance of the dissenting members.[82]

Where an attempt to incorporate an existing unincorporated association, or to merge such association into a corporation, is ineffectual, such action in no wise affects the existence[83] or property[84] of the association, which remains a quasi entity distinct from the entity of the new corporation,[85] and no member of the association can or does become a member of the corporation without his knowledge and consent.[86] Under such circumstances, an election of new officers by the association is lawful,[87] the books and records remain the property of the association,[88] title to the property of the association remains vested in the trustees for the benefit of the association even though they may resign as trustees of the association and be elected trustees of the corporation,[89] and in a proper case the association may be entitled to an accounting,[90] or to the appointment of a receiver of the property[91]

Members of a chapter of a national association who have recognized it after notification of its incorporation may be estopped to deny the validity of the incorporation or to contend that the incorporated association did not succeed to the rights and authority of the unincorporated association[92]

Notice of an intention to incorporate an association should be given,[93] even where a statute authorizes the incorporation of associations and no provision for notice is contained therein.[94]

Burden of proof. In a contest between a voluntary association and an alleged corporation formed in the same name by members claiming that the act of becoming incorporated was that of the association, the burden is on the alleged corporation to show clearly the authority to incorporate, or else a ratification of the incorporation by the society.[95] So the burden of proving that an association became merged in a corporation rests upon the party setting up the merger.[96]

(1) By Consent of Members

Subject to the rights of third persons, an association may be dissolved by unanimous vote of its members, although a mere majority has been held unable to dissolve the association against the dissent of a minority.

An unincorporated association may be dissolved by the unanimous consent of its members,[97] provided the meeting held for that purpose is regularly called;[98] but it has been held that a mere majority of the members cannot dissolve the association against the wishes of the minority,[99] where the minority consists of a sufficient number to constitute the association;[1] and much less can the association be dissolved by the act of a single member in violation of the contract contained in the articles of association or constitution.[2]

As against third persons. An unincorporated association, doing business under a recognized name, and liable under the statute to be sued by such name, cannot go out of existence by the mutual consent of its members, while its contracts and obligations are outstanding, and thus avoid liability to suit thereon.[3]

(2) By Cesser of Associate Object

An association may become dissolved by reason of the cessation of its object or purpose.

Where the purpose of a voluntary association entirely fails, the society becomes dissolved.[4] Thus, where an association is formed by contributing individuals to accomplish a certain object upon the occurrence of a specified event, otherwise the contributions to be returned to the members, the association will be regarded as dissolved if the event fails to occur and the object of the association thus ceases.[5]

(3) By Abandonment or Nonuser

The abandonment or nonuser of an association may result in its dissolution; but the loss of the property and failure to hold meetings or elect officers are not of themselves such an abandonment or nonuser as necessarily to effect a dissolution.

An association may be regarded as dissolved if it abandons the purposes of its creation and ceases to exercise its functions,[6] especially where power to resume business does not exist.[7] However, neither the loss of the association's property,[8] nor a failure to hold regular meetings[9] or to elect officers,[10] nor all combined,[11] necessarily amounts to an abandonment.

The question whether the society has become dissolved by abandonment is one of law for the court.[12]

(4) By Withdrawal of Members

The withdrawal of a part of its members ordinarily will not effect the dissolution of an association.

The withdrawal of one or more members of an association does not ipso facto operate as a dissolution of that body, if it is evident that the association was designed to have a continuing existence;[13] and this is so, although the withdrawing members dispose of property, the ownership of which entitled them to admission to membership.[14] Even a withdrawal of a majority of the members in a body does not have this effect if enough members remain loyal to the association to carry out its purposes.[15]

(5) By Death of Members

The death of a member does not cause dissolution of an association.

The death of a member of an association does not work a dissolution of that body.[16]

(6) By Incorporation

Creation of a corporation pursuant to unanimous vote of the members of an association to incorporate the same operates as a dissolution of the association.

If the members of an association unanimously vote to incorporate it, the creation of the corporation pursuant thereto ipso facto dissolves the association and transfers its property and rights to the corporation.[17] To have this effect, however, all the members must consent to the incorporation, the act of a mere majority in securing a corporate charter is insufficient,[18] and, where the administrative board of an association having members in several states organizes a corporation in one of the states in the name of the association, the corporation does not succeed to the property and rights of the association until it has been accepted by the vote of the associate members or their representatives, although the constitution of the association authorizes the administrative board to take out a charter for the state in which it officiates in the name of the association.[19] A special legislative act incorporating certain members of a voluntary association and their associates does not work a dissolution of the association, where the corporation is created, not as a substitute for the association, but in its aid, and the association as a body has no authority to accept the charter and organize a corporation under it, or to merge itself in a corporation organized thereunder;[20] and this is so, although the association votes to accept the charter, and in some respects assumes to be a corporation, where it in fact continues to act as a voluntary association.[21]

Incorporation of a national association will not necessarily defeat a trust in the form of a subscription agreement to create a building fund for a local chapter.[22]

Merger of association in corporation. An association is not merged in a corporation formed by a majority of its members under the same name and for the same purposes, where each organization is distinct in officers, meetings, property, and other incidents,[23] in the absence of facts creating an estoppel against the nonconsenting members,[24] or constituting a ratification by them of the act of the majority in forming the corporation.[25] The act of the majority in procuring a corporate charter cannot, of course, be ratified by those who could not in the first instance have authorized it.[26]

Statutory transfer of property. A transfer of property from an unincorporated association to a corporation composed of the same members may be worked by legislative enactment, accepted and given effect to by the two organizations.[27]

(7) By Surrender or Revocation of Charter of Subordinate or Branch Body

The voluntary surrender of its charter by a local branch of an association may dissolve such local and result in a transfer of its property to the principal body pursuant to governing provisions of the association's constitution, although revocation of the local charter by the state or national body generally effects a dissolution without transfer of property

Where an unincorporated association organizes a subordinate branch or body, there is as a rule no contractual relation between them by or under which the superior order or association may reserve to itself the right to take possession of and use as its own, property of the subordinate association in the event of lawful suspension or dissolution of the latter,[28] and where, pursuant to the laws of the order, the main association has revoked the charter of the subordinate, especially if such revocation is without sufficient cause and the right to revoke is contested, the supreme body has no power to require the subordinate body to surrender to it the funds and property thereof.[29] Where, however, the subordinate body has voluntarily relinquished its charter, the constitution or laws of the association requiring surrender of its property to the main or superior organization may be enforced,[30] and the same result follows where the subordinate body has consented to or acquiesced in a revocation of its charter by the superior association, in which case the provisions of the constitution of the association control as respect disposition of the property of the dissolved subordinate or branch association.[31] These questions frequently arise in con-

(8) By Legislative Action

It is within the power of the legislature to enact statutes in effect dissolving associations with objects contrary to the fundamental principles of our form of government.

The state has power to eradicate, or in substance to dissolve, by appropriate legislation, any association which is in its objects opposed to the fundamental principles of our government, and is not required to await actual violation of law before enacting such legislation.[32]

(9) By Judicial Process

(a) In general
(b) Grounds
(c) Venue

(a) In General

Equity has jurisdiction to decree the dissolution of an unincorporated association, but will not exercise its powers in this respect while a majority of the members favor continuance of the association, nor in violation of lawful provisions of the association's constitution.

A court of equity has undoubted jurisdiction in a proper case to decree the dissolution of an unincorporated association,[33] but it will not dissolve a private unincorporated association organized for general purposes of public utility, and divide its assets among its members, so long as members remain who are ready and willing to execute the public trust with which the association is charged,[34] especially where the application for dissolution is made by a mere minority,[35] and, where the constitution of a society provides that it shall not be dissolved so long as a specified number of members favor its continuance, such provision is controlling in an action to obtain a dissolution.[36]

(b) Grounds

An association may be dissolved by judicial process on the ground that it is opposed to public policy, or because its operations have been abandoned, or because of differences among the members, although ordinarily dissolution will not be decreed on the latter ground so long as the association is fairly conducted in a manner conducive to execution of its purposes The wrongful expulsion of a member does not justify dissolution, unless the association in effect constitutes a partnership, in which case any ground which would justify dissolution of a partnership will warrant dissolution of such association.

An association may be dissolved on the ground that it is illegal as contrary to public policy.[37]

When the operations of an association have been discontinued, its objects being abandoned by common consent of the members, equity has jurisdiction to decree a dissolution[38] Violent dissensions and irreconcilable differences among the members of an association constitute a good ground for dissolving it at the instance of one or more of its members,[39] especially where, in consequence thereof, the objects of the association have been defeated.[40] Ordinarily, however, the courts will not interfere to dissolve an association on this ground so long as the government of the society is fairly administered, and its purposes can be carried out;[41] and in any event the member or members aggrieved should first exhaust their remedies for redress in the association itself, if any are provided, before resorting to the courts for relief by way of dissolution.[42]

Under the charter of a voluntary association, providing that the president of a defunct lodge should deliver to the grand lodge, "charter, seal, rituals, unwritten work, and all other supplies furnished by Grand Lodge, and all effects of lodge at time of dissolution," "all other supplies" come within the rule of ejusdem generis, and "effects" include money, bonds, and other property—Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v Williams, 277 S.W 500, 211 Ky. 638

If what is claimed of it is true, it strikes at fundamental principles of our government, principles that have been recognized as the foundation of our liberties. R.I.—Industrial Trust Co. v. Green,

The wrongful expulsion of a member from the association, while affording grounds for an equitable suit to compel reinstatement (infra § 26), does not justify a court of equity in decreeing a dissolution,[43] unless the association is of such a nature that in legal effect it constitutes a partnership,[44] in which case it may be dissolved by a court of equity upon any ground that would justify the dissolution of a partnership.[45]

A disorderly and irregular vote removing the president of an association from office, but not expelling him from membership, does not constitute ground for dissolution.[46]

(c) Venue

Generally speaking a suit to dissolve an unincorporated association should be brought in the judicial district where its property is located and its operations are conducted.

Ordinarily a suit to dissolve an unincorporated association should be brought in the judicial district where its headquarters and property are located and its business is actually transacted.[47]

b. Receivers

In accordance with general rules, a receiver may be appointed to conserve the assets of an association

In a proper case a receiver may be appointed to conserve the property of an association.[48]

In the title Receivers will be found a detailed treatment of the general grounds and circumstances for and under which such officers may be appointed.

§ 10. —— Operation and Effect

a. In general
b. Distribution of assets

a. In General

Either by virtue of statute or independently thereof a court of equitable jurisdiction may in a proper case wind up an association and duly settle its affairs.

As will appear from a reference to the statutes, and to the case cited infra this note, in some states the statutes expressly confer upon a court of equity jurisdiction to wind up voluntary associations in the manner provided for winding up insolvent corporations.[49]

Independently of statute, a court of equitable jurisdiction may interfere in a proper case to settle the affairs of an association by providing for the sale of its property and the distribution of the proceeds under the direction of the court,[50] or by distributing associate funds among the several contributing members in proportion to the amount respectively contributed by them.[51] So equity may in a proper case intervene to ascertain the liabilities of an association, and to require each member to pay his pro rata share thereof.[52] Where, however, a bill is filed by some of the members of

The Act of 1899 provides that the chancellor may wind up voluntary associations in the manner provided for winding up insolvent corporations under the Act of 1875. It was held that the provisions respecting the winding up of insolvent corporations contained in the Act of 1875 being substantially re-enacted in the Act of 1896, its effect was to continue them in force, notwithstanding the repealing clause, so that they could be adopted by the Act of 1899.—Henry v. an association against the others to have its affairs wound up on the grounds that there are irreconcilable differences between the parties, and that defendants have wrongfully excluded complainants from the enjoyment of the property of the association, and the answer alleges that complainants were lawfully expelled, and that defendants are, under the by-laws, the lawful custodians of the property, no steps will be taken by the court before final hearing, except to restrain defendants from disposing of the property.[53]

Authority of commissioners to wind up. Commissioners appointed to wind up the affairs of a dissolved association have no authority to bind the members by a new undertaking.[54]

b. Distribution of Assets

(1) Rights of members
(2) Rights of creditors
(3) Apportionment of liability of members

(1) Rights of Members

Upon the dissolution of an association its net assets should as a rule be distributed pro rata among those who were members at the time of dissolution or the legal representatives of deceased members

Upon the dissolution of a voluntary association, unless otherwise provided by its rules,[55] its property should be distributed pro rata among its members,[56] provided the rights of third persons have not intervened, as explained below in § 10 b (2), and provided the association does not partake of the nature of a charity.[57]

One who ceased to be a member prior to the dissolution is not entitled to share in the distribution,[58] since the interest of a member in the property of the association ceases on the termination of his membership, as will be shown in § 27.

The heirs or devisees of a deceased member are not entitled to share in the distribution,[59] unless the association was dissolved before the death of such member occurred.[60]

Reversion of property to grantor. Unless so provided in the grant, the real property of an association does not revert to the grantor on dissolution of the society.[61] Accordingly, a lease held by an association does not revert to the lessor on dissolution of the society within the term,[62] but on the contrary it becomes the property of the several members who may jointly exercise their rights as lessees,[63] and this is so although the lease contains a provision against assignment.[64]

(2) Rights of Creditors

The funds and property of an association are on dissolution applicable primarily to the payment of its debts, preference being given to nonmember creditors as against member creditors The purchaser of associate property will ordinarily take it free and clear of the claims of creditors.

On dissolution of an association, its property and funds are applicable primarily to the payment of its debts;[65] and the property of the association must first be applied to pay the debts of creditors who are not members before it can be applied to the debts of those who are members.[66]

The fact that persons extending credit to the association agree to look only to its assets for the satisfaction of their claims, thus exempting the members from individual liability, does not give them a lien on the assets; and accordingly, where the association disposes of all its property and ceases to be a going concern, the purchaser thereof does not take the same impressed with a trust for the benefit of the association's creditors.[67]

(3) Apportionment of Liability of Members

After the assets of the association have been exhausted, the courts will apportion its debts among the members, each member being liable to the creditors for all such debts, although as between the members each is bound to pay only his numerical proportion.

If the assets of the association fail to equal its debts, the courts will apportion the liabilities among the members and make assessments accordingly.[68]

As between the members of an unincorporated association, each is bound, after the exhaustion of all the assets of the company, to pay only his numerical proportion of the debts of the concern;[69] but as against the creditors each member is liable for all the debts.[70]

A statute authorizing the chancellor to wind up associations in the same manner provided for winding up insolvent corporations does not clothe the chancellor with power to enforce payment of the debts of an association by an assessment against the members thereof, where by a previous proceeding in chancery the business in which such debts were contracted has been wound up and the assets distributed.[71]

§ 11. Articles of Association, Constitution and By-Laws

a. In general
b. As contract between members
c. Amendment and repeal
d. Jurisdiction of courts as to reasonableness and construction

a. In General

The articles of association, constitution, or by-laws of an unincorporated association are designed to define the privileges and duties of the members, and if not contrary to public policy may be of whatever character the members care to adopt.

The function of the constitution and by-laws of an unincorporated association is to define the privileges secured and the duties assumed by those who have become members.[72]

The association, being solely a creature of convention between the members, has the power to adopt such articles of association or constitution and to enact such by-laws as the associates may agree upon,[73] so long as they are not contrary to public policy or the law of the land.[74]

If an association has a constitution or articles of association, no resolution can be effectively adopted in conflict therewith;[75] but an association without articles of association or constitution may adopt such by-laws as it sees fit.[76]

Regulation restricting freedom of speech

Where a regulation of the American Legion provided that "Where the National Organization has taken a position on any subject under mandate of the National Convention, no Post or County Organization may adopt a resolution in conflict with that position A Post or County Organization, however, may adopt resolutions protesting against the action taken at the National Convention and petitioning that such action be amended or rescinded. Such resolution of protest, however, must not be given to the public press nor be forwarded to any public officials but must be submitted to the National Organization through channels," and a member post disregarded this resolution by transmitting to the public press a statement of the post's action in adopting a resolution which opposed the present payment of the soldiers' bonus, the gravamen of the offense being that after the national body had taken a position on this subject, the post made public a contrary stand, in holding that expulsion of the post for such action was unlawful, the court condemned the regulation as unreasonable and invalid saying: "To subject a subordinate group of the Legion, consisting of sixty-seven members, to the disgrace of banishment because its officers failed to comply with a regulation such as this, designed to suppress public expression of an independent view by a subdivision of the national body, on a matter which is wholly outside the scope of the granted powers of the American Legion as defined by its charter, is contrary to law, unsound in principle, and out of harmony with the noble ideals for which this fine organization was founded."—Gallaher v. or post of an association is invalid where not in compliance with applicable provisions of the constitution of the association.[77]

b. As Contract between Members

The constitution and by-laws of an association constitute an enforceable contract between the parties.

The articles of association or constitution and the by-laws so agreed upon constitute a contract which the courts will enforce both as between the members themselves and as between the association on one side and the individual members on the other, and their rights and powers, and duties and liabilities, are measured accordingly.[78] To be binding on the members, however, the articles or constitution and the by-laws must have been assented to by them, as in the case of other contracts[79]

c. Amendment and Repeal

The articles of association or constitution of an association are subject to amendment. Amendment should be in accordance with constitutional or other provisions therefor, or by majority vote of a quorum in the absence of express provision as to amendment.

An association has power to amend its articles of association or constitution in the mode prescribed therein[80]

The by-laws of an association may ordinarily be amended or repealed at any time at the will of the members,[81] provided the alteration is not inconsistent with the fundamental scheme of the society[82] and does not destroy vested rights[83] All this is so because, on all rights and duties incident to membership, every member, by his contract of membership, pledges his assent in advance to every lawful rule adopted by the majority in furtherance of the common objects.[84]

Mode of amendment or repeal. To be effective, the amendment or repeal of the constitution or by-laws must be regularly made in the manner provided by the organic law of the association,[85] and accordingly a new constitution adopted in a mode other than that provided for in the old constitution was held void.[86] Substantial compliance, however, with the organic law is sufficient.[87] By the adoption of a new constitution and by-laws covering the same grounds as the former ones and intended as a substitute for the same, the earlier constitution and by-laws are repealed;[88] but a by-law is not repealed by the adoption of a new constitution making no reference to the by-laws and not inconsistent therewith.[89]

If the by-laws of an association make no provision for their alteration or amendment, they may be altered, amended, or repealed at any meeting of the members where there is a quorum by a majority vote of those present.[90]

Usage. Evidence of an association's established method of doing business is sufficient to show acquiescence in or consent to a departure from its by-laws.[91]

d. Jurisdiction of Courts as to Reasonableness and Construction

While the courts ordinarily will not pass on the reasonableness of the articles of association or constitution, they may construe them or determine whether they were duly adopted.

If the members of an association expressly or impliedly consent to the articles of association or constitution and the by-laws, the courts ordinarily will not pass on the question of the reasonableness thereof.[92] They may, however, determine whether the by-laws have been adopted according to the rule agreed upon by the members of the association,[93] although if the issue as to whether a by-law has been adopted is merely one of fact, it is for the jury.[94]

It has uniformly been held that the courts may construe and fix the meaning of the articles or constitution and the by-laws.[95] However, the final decision of the regular tribunal of an association that a particular by-law has not become a dead letter will not ordinarily be reviewed by the courts.[96]

§ 12. Rights, Powers, and Liabilities of Association

a. In general
b. Practice of law

a. In General

The rights, powers, and liabilities of an association are governed by common or statutory law, by usage, and by the provisions of its articles of association or constitution, if any. Generally speaking, an association lacks corporate powers and cannot issue stock

It has been stated generally that an association being solely a creature of convention between the members, no check exists upon its right to transact its business in such manner as it may agree upon, so long as it does not act illegally or contrary to public policy, and the regularity of the proceedings is presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary.[97] The rights and powers of the asso-

Forced construction

The court will not force a construction which will place the framers of the constitution of the American League of Professional Baseball Clubs in a position of enacting a meaningless tautology, or a provision which has no vitality, because it is redundant—American League Baseball Club of New York v. Johnson, 179 N Y S 498, 109 Misc 138, affirmed 179 N.Y S 898, 190 App Div. 932

Practical construction

The court, in construing a provision of the constitution of an association, will consider the practical construction given such provision by the association.—Edgar v. Halpin, 185 N Y.S 307.

Meaning of "trust" as employed in constitution

The word "trust," as used in the constitution of an association organized for the purpose of protecting its members against loss by reason of extending credit to those unworthy of trust, means to give credit to, and relates to a person's financial ability to pay his debts—Putnal v. Inman, 80 So. 316, 76 Fla. 553, 3 A L.R. 1580.

Preamble of constitution

(1) The preamble to the constitution of an association cannot control the words of the constitution unless the constitution itself is ambiguous—Ace Bus Transp. Co. v. South Hudson County Boulevard Bus Owners' Ass'n, 177 A 360, 118 N J Eq 31, affirmed 180 A 835, 119 N J.Eq 37.

(2) The preamble to the constitution of a bus owners' association stating an intrastate route covered by buses did not limit the powers of the association or preclude the members thereof from adopting a proposition to run buses across the state line—Ace Bus Transp. ciation depend primarily upon the established principles of the common law, as supplemented or changed by statute, as will appear more fully from an examination of subsequent sections of this Title. An association without articles, constitution, or adopted rules is governed by common parliamentary rules as respects the regularity of its meetings, and, subject to restrictions as to the right of expelling a member, can make changes in its governing rules at will at any meeting duly held [98]

Ordinarily, however, the agreement of association is embodied in a formal constitution or articles of association, and in this event the rights and powers of the society are governed by the articles or constitution so adopted, as has been shown in preceding sections, subject, of course, to such limitations as may exist either at common law or by statute.

The powers of an association may be determined by usage acquiesced in by the members thereof.[99]

An association without articles or constitution or by-laws cannot adopt any measure subversive of the objects for which the association was formed;[1] nor can it do an illegal act;[2] but in the absence of a constitution and by-laws it may adopt any lawful means to accomplish its object [3]

An association has no corporate powers, even where it is formed under a general statute authorizing individuals to unite as a voluntary association under a distinguishing associate name for trading purposes.[4] An unincorporated association cannot issue shares of stock, unless organized as a joint stock company.[5]

The capacity of an association to act as trustee will be considered in the title Trusts § 209 [65 C. J. p 571 notes 12–14].

b. Practice of Law

Legislation may properly prohibit an association from practicing law.

The courts have held that it is competent for the legislature to enact statutes forbidding the practice of law by associations,[6] and in this connection it has been pointed out that the practice of law includes both court work and "office" practice.[7] It would not be competent, however, for the

"So far as the practice of the law relates to the performance of the functions of an attorney or counsellor at law before the courts, it comprises mastery of the facts and law constituting the cause of action or legal proceeding of whatever nature, the preparation of pleadings, process, and other papers incident to such action or proceeding, and the management and trial of the action or proceeding on behalf of clients before judicial tribunals These matters closely concern the courts Legislation forbidding such practice of the law by corporations or associations, or by individuals other than members of the bar, would be within the competency of the General Court It would tend to enhance the effectiveness of the judicial department."—In re Opinion of the Justices, (Mass) 194 N E. 313, 316.

"Practice of law under modern conditions consists in no small part of work performed outside of any court and having no immediate relation to proceedings in court. It embraces conveyancing, the giving of legal advice on a large variety of subjects, and the preparation and execution of legal instruments covering an extensive field of business and trust relations and other affairs Although these transactions may have no direct connection with court proceedings, they are always subject to become involved in litigation. They require in many aspects a high degree of legal skill, a wide experience with men and affairs, and great capacity for adaptation to difficult and complex situations. These 'customary functions of an attorney or counsellor' (as they are described in question 2 of the order) bear an intimate relation to the administration of justice by the courts No valid distinction, so far as concerns the questions set forth in the order, can be drawn between that part of the work of the lawyer which involves appearance in court and that part which involves advice and drafting of instruments in his office The work of the office lawyer is the groundwork for future possible contests in courts . . . The underlying reasons which prevent corporations, associations and individuals other than members of the bar from appearing before the courts apply with equal force to the performance of these customary functions of attorneys and counsellors at law outside of courts"—In re Opinion of the Justices, (Mass.) 194 N E 313, 317.

legislature to enact statutes permitting the practice of law by associations [8]

§ 13. —— Name and Seal

An association has the right to adopt a distinctive name and will be protected in its exclusive use. An association is not required to possess a seal, and it has been said that it has no right to use a common seal.

An unincorporated association has the right to adopt a name by which it shall be known.[9] The name of an unincorporated association is a necessary element of its existence and the right to its exclusive use will be protected upon the same principle that persons are protected in the use of trade marks;[10] thus, in a proper case, a court of equity will protect an association in the use of its name by the issuance of an injunction,[11] although complainant association may not be carrying on a trade, or an industrial or financial business which could be injuriously affected,[12] and the right to injunction in such cases has been determined to be dependent neither upon an actual showing of specific injury nor the misleading of any particular person, the demands of the law in this respect being met when it is made to appear that there is a natural and probable tendency to mislead and confuse the public to the injury of the association having the prior right to the distinctive names and emblems.[13] However, equity will not grant injunctive relief in such cases unless plaintiff association's exclusive right to the use of such name is clearly established,[14] nor will relief be granted where laches have barred enforcement of complainant's right.[15]

(2) A credit men's association offering services in presenting proofs of claim in bankruptcy proceedings, participating in the election of a trustee, furnishing approved forms, proof of claim, and power of attorney, and suggesting the name of some person assumed by the association to be suitable as an attorney in fact—Rinderknecht v. Toledo Ass'n of Credit Men, supra.

(3) A credit men's association using powers of attorney obtained through suggesting the name of some person assumed by the association to be suitable as an attorney in fact in bankruptcy proceedings, or otherwise in the election of a trustee, who was a member or officer of the association—Rinderknecht v. Toledo Ass'n of Credit Men, supra

(4) A credit men's association appearing before a referee in bankruptcy and collecting for a reasonable fee, for the use of the association, dividends on proved and allowed claims, representation of which was obtained by the association, where the fee exacted was the reasonable and customary percentage of the amount collected—Rinderknecht v. Toledo Ass'n of Credit Men, supra

(5) A credit men's association applying with consent of the trustee, to the uses of the association, fees of the trustee, whose election was secured by the association through the use of powers of attorney obtained by the association, although such practice required the referee's critical attitude—Rinderknecht v. Toledo Ass'n of Credit Men, supra.

Dissatisfied members of an association cannot deprive it of the right to use its own name by incorporating themselves thereunder, and enjoining it from using the same[16]

An association limited to members of one race may secure an injunction against use of its name and emblems by another association limited to members of a different race.[17]

§ 14. —— Taking, Holding, and Transfer of Property

a Taking and holding property
b. Conveyance or assignment of property or funds, and application thereof

a. Taking and Holding Property

(1) In general
(2) Conveyance to trustees for association or members

(1) In General

Generally speaking an unincorporated association may not, as such, take or hold property, although its members may hold property jointly as individuals.

In the absence of a statute empowering it to do so, it is ordinarily held that an unincorporated association, having no legal existence independent of the members who compose it, is incapable, as an organization, of taking or holding either real or personal property in its associate name,[22] and that a conveyance to an unincorporated association passes title to no one;[23] but there is some authority to the contrary,[24] and it has been held that an unincorporated association may take and hold personal property at least to the extent that the person giving or selling such property cannot retake it or otherwise dispose of it.[25]

In any event, the members of a voluntary association may take and hold property jointly as in-

Laches shown by thirty years' inaction and acquiescence.—Ancient Egyptian Arabic Order of Nobles of the Mystic Shrine v Michaux, 49 S Ct 485, 279 U.S 737, 73 L Ed 931, reversing Burrell v. Michaux, (Tex. Com App) 286 S.W 176, which affirmed (Civ App) 273 S W. 874.

"We take it to be fairly well settled law, at least by the better authorities, an unincorporated association may take and hold personal property at least to the extent that the person giving or selling such dividuals,[26] and accordingly a grant to an association name may, under the circumstances, be construed as a grant to its members,[27] and a gift to an association by name, if not impressed with any trust or charitable use, may vest in the persons composing the society.[28]

In a proper case, equity may treat the active members of an association as trustees of the associate interest in the property.[29]

(2) Conveyance to Trustees for Association or Members

Conveyance may be made to trustees for the benefit of an unincorporated association, legal title then vesting in such trustees. Where there is a sufficient designation of the members as beneficiaries, they have an equitable interest in the property.

To avoid the inconveniences resulting from the incapacity of a voluntary association to take and hold property as an organization, conveyances may be made to trustees for the use and benefit of the association or its members.[30] In such case the legal title vests in the trustees,[31] and, where two associations consolidate, the trustees of the property of one of the associations thereafter hold the same in trust for the members of the united body.[32]

If the members are sufficiently designated as beneficiaries,[33] they have an equitable interest in the property,[34] and each is entitled to the same voice in the management, control, and disposition of the property as if he were a joint owner and holder of the legal title.[35]

The trustee may be either a natural or an artificial person,[36] and the society itself may make provision for trustees in whom property may be vested for its use.[37]

A court of equity will compel the transfer of funds from former trustees of a voluntary association to trustees newly elected,[38] and, after an as-property to it cannot retake it or otherwise dispose of it, so that if one gave a book, or money to buy a book, to the Commercial Association for its library, that person could not retake the book or reclaim the money on the pretext that the donee was incapable of holding it Such associations would be treated in equity as quasi partnerships, each member of which would be entitled to an interest in the property donated or purchased. . . . There is not a solitary reason for the holding of some courts that gifts to nonincorporated associations are invalid, except blind adherence to outworn precedents"—Hartman v. Defect in conveyance not fatal

Where members of an association authorized duly elected trustees to convey property to a certain person to enable such person to execute a mortgage to avoid foreclosure of an existing mortgage, any mere defect in execution of the deed to such person, or of his mortgage, will not, in equity, be permitted to defeat the rights of those holding by mesne conveyances from such person.—Hope of Alabama Lodge of Odd Fellows v Chambless, 103 So. 54, 212 Ala. 444.

sociation has become incorporated, it has the right to demand and receive from its former trustees a conveyance of the legal title to its property.[39]

b. Conveyance or Assignment of Property or Funds, and Application Thereof

(1) Disposition of property or funds
(2) Application of property or funds

(1) Disposition of Property or Funds

While an association may not as a legal entity dispose of property held by its members jointly, an assignment made by vote at a regular meeting pursuant to the constitution and by-laws is valid and effectual. Where the property is vested in particular trustees, the members may pass the equitable but not the legal title thereto

An association cannot as a legal entity dispose of property held by its members jointly.[40] Where, however, under the constitution and by-laws, all members in good standing have sole control of the funds, an assignment of the property of the association, executed pursuant to a vote at a regular meeting by all the members in good standing, is sufficient to vest complete title thereto in the assignee.[41]

A minority cannot compel a sale and distribution of the property of the association among the members so long as it continues to be used for the purposes for which it was acquired.[42]

In case property is vested in trustees for the use of an association or its members, the members may by conveyance pass the equitable title thereto,[43] but neither they[44] nor the association[45] can convey the legal title; and in case there are several trustees all must join in the conveyance.[46]

Equity will compel a trustee who holds title to the property or funds of an association to convey or assign the same pursuant to a unanimous vote of the society[47]

(2) Application of Property or Funds

An unincorporated association may in conformity with the will of the majority devote its funds to a purpose within the purposes of the association, but may not apply funds to other purposes without unanimous consent.

An unincorporated association, acting in conformity with the will of the majority of its members, has a right to devote its funds to any purpose calculated to promote the objects of the association,[48] but it has no right to apply them to other uses, except with the unanimous consent of the members[49] Further, where a fund is subscribed for a particular purpose, a majority of the subscribers cannot devote the fund to any other purpose without the consent of the minority, although it may be composed of a single subscriber only[50]

Although the articles of association provide that the management of the concern shall be subject to rules and regulations adopted by a majority of the associates, yet an individual member may resort to a court of justice for redress in case of the fraudulent appropriation or the willful destruction of the joint property,[51] but where a fund has passed into the hands of new trustees, between whom and the original contributors there is no privity, such trus-

Applications held unauthorized

(1) Under Civ Code (1910) § 3755, providing that a trustee, unless expressly authorized or by consent, cannot sell or convey the trust property without an order of the court of chancery, a conveyance by the trustees of an unincorporated fraternal society, without the consent of all members or an order of court, to one who reconveyed to the trustees and others individually, was unauthorized—Myrick v. Holmes, 107 S E 324, 151 Ga. 437.

(2) Where the by-laws of a lodge provided that "financial help" would be accorded members, and that application therefor could be made by any member who is destitute and unable to procure employment and is without the necessities of life, a vote to reimburse a member who paid a fine imposed on an employee of the lodge was illegal, since the payment of the lodge's money for such purposes would be an unauthorized diversion of its funds, the by-laws providing for "help" for members having reference only to members in actual need of help—Nickerson v. Houlton Lodge of Elks, No. 835, 111 A. 331, 119 Me. 309.

Waiver held ineffectual to validate assignment

Waiver of the signers' claims in a fund collected from them and other members of an association, the trustee of which was authorized to assign the fund to a bankrupt partnership, was held not effective as an assignment of the members' title—Barnes v. Church, 173 A 226, 118 Conn 521.

tees are not accountable to them for the fund; their remedy is against the original trustees.[52]

If any part of the fund is not needed for the purpose for which it was subscribed, the contributors have a right to have it repaid to them in proportion to their contributions,[53] after deducting proper charges and expenses and unavoidable losses[54]

§ 15. —— Contracts

Strictly speaking, an association lacks capacity to make a contract unless authorized to do so by statute However, contracts made in the name of the association by its officers or members may be enforceable against such officers or members, or as against third persons on principles of estoppel Associate members will not, as a rule, be liable on unauthorized contracts entered into by their officers.

In the absence of statutes, such as those permitting suits against associations (infra § 36), which expressly or impliedly authorize an unincorporated association, as such, to enter into contracts in its own name,[55] it has no capacity to do so,[56] and is not liable, as an association, on contracts made in its name.[57]

Officers of an association who make a contract in its name, however, and members of the association who assent to the contract so made, are personally bound thereby, as will be shown hereinafter in §§ 20 and 32, respectively; and the contract is likewise binding on the other party thereto,[58] and may be sued on by the associate members, and, under some statutes, either by a duly authorized officer of the association or by the association itself in its own name, as will be explained in § 35.

Where a number of persons, firms, and corporations engaged in the business of dredging have entered into an association to maintain prices for dredging, and to distribute equitably work, the conduct of which has been put under the control of an adjuster, such adjuster is not entitled to personal relief from the fact that he had not received his just share of the work, since the distribution was entirely within his own hands[59]

An averment that an association was organized for pecuniary profit, if unchallenged by motion to make more definite, is sufficient to authorize proof of such a purpose in its formation as would authorize contracts in excess of the fund provided by the initiation fees and dues.[60]

Estoppel to deny contractual capacity. One who deals with an association as a legal entity capable of transacting business, and in consequence receives from it money or other thing of value, is estopped from denying its right to contract.[61]

Unauthorized contract. Members of an association, such as a political committee, are not liable, as such, to a third person on an unauthorized and unratified contract made by an officer of the committee while acting beyond the apparent scope of his authority.[62]

Leases. An association may, through its officers or members, enter into a valid lease of premises for its

Labor and material

A political campaign committee, whose purpose was to elect candidates after nomination, was not liable for labor and material furnished primary committees, whose objects were to nominate certain candidates, notwithstanding members, who ordered the work performed and who were individually liable, were also members of the campaign committee, where the record disclosed that the campaign committee did not ratify or confirm the purchases —Humphrys v. Republican Central Campaign Committee, 182 A. 366, 320 Pa. 353.

Apparent authority not shown

That plaintiff had furnished material in prior years on the orders of the executive officers of a political campaign committee did not justify plaintiff's reliance on the apparent authority of the officers of the primary committees, who made purchases for such committees, to purchase on behalf of the campaign committee —Humphrys v. Republican Central Campaign Committee, 182 A 366, 320 Pa. 353.

use.[63] A recital in a lease that it is made by and between an association, as landlord, and an individual, as tenant, has been held conclusive, in an action between third parties, that the association is to be regarded as landlord.[64] Where a voluntary nonprofit association as tenants had the duty under a lease to surrender premises to the landlord, all members had a joint interest in such surrender and a reciprocal duty to observe its obligations, including the duty to surrender premises at the end of the term, and for their failure to do so an agreement in the lease would be implied at the landlord's election for continued tenancy or holdover for another year.[65] Where a voluntary association, which agreed to surrender the premises to its landlord at the end of the term, vacated the premises because of a factional disagreement, leaving minority of members in control thereof, and the association failed to surrender the premises in accordance with the lease, the landlord could treat the association as holding over for the ensuing year, so as to be entitled to possession of the premises and to a personal judgment against the association for rent for the extended period.[66]

An unincorporated association may be held liable for the torts of its members or employees committed in the prosecution of its business, as where the association occupies the position of principal as respects the tortfeasor, but not otherwise. An association is not responsible for the tort of a third person committed while engaged in the individual business of a member of the association.

A voluntary unincorporated association has been held liable in tort for the wrongful acts of its members when acting collectively in the prosecution of the business for which it is organized,[67] responsible for torts of its members or employees when encouraged in them, or if ratified thereafter,[68] and liable for the conversion of property intrusted to one of its officers, as such, where it has negligently allowed him to appropriate the property to his own use.[69] So, it may be held liable for the tort of an individual member when, in respect to the act complained of, the association occupies the relation of principal,[70] but not otherwise.[71]

An association may not be held responsible for the negligence of a third person employed by a member in the prosecution of the member's business.[72]

Libel. Following the general rules governing the tort liability of unincorporated associations, such an association may be liable for its libel;[73] and so the members of an unincorporated association are liable in their collective capacity for libel published by their agent with their authority while the agent is acting within the scope of his employment,[74] just as a corporation is liable under like circumstances.

An action for libel may be brought against an unincorporated association by one of its members,[75]

but the association is not liable to a member for the unauthorized or privileged communication of charges against the member by an officer of the association.[76]

An association cannot, as such, commit a crime.

Only individuals or corporations can be indicted and convicted of the commission of crimes, and an unincorporated association of persons denominated as trustees cannot be indicted and convicted of crime, since, if a crime is committed, it must be committed by them as individuals.[77]

§ 18. Meetings

a. By whom called
b. Notice
c. Quorum
d. Conduct of meetings
e. Adjourned meetings

a. By Whom Called

A meeting should be called by competent authority in order to render proceedings taken thereat valid and effectual.

In order to render the proceedings at a meeting effectual, it must have been called under competent authority.[78]

An officer who has been removed cannot call a meeting, and hence a vote taken at a meeting held on a notice signed by him is of no effect.[79]

b. Notice

All members of an association should be notified of the time, place, and purpose of a meeting, irrespective of whether or not the laws of the association prescribe such notice. The time and manner of notice should comply with applicable rules, if any, of the constitution or by-laws, and if no length of time is prescribed, reasonable notice must be given. Notice may be waived.

All the members of an association must be notified of the time and place of a special meeting, and of the particular purpose for which it is called,[80] especially when business of an unusual character is to be transacted;[81] and no business should be transacted that is not specified in the notice.[82] These rules apply whether or not the laws of the association prescribe such notice.[83]

When the time or manner of giving notice of meetings is prescribed by the constitution, articles of association, or by-laws of an association, it is essential to the validity of the acts done at a meeting that the notice thereof shall have been given in the mode prescribed,[84] and where no length of time is prescribed, reasonable notice must be given.[85]

Waiver of notice. If all the members appear at a meeting and participate in the proceedings without objection, it will be deemed a waiver by each member of any defect due to insufficiency of notice;[86] but if a member having a right to be present and vote is absent,[87] or if, being present, he refuses his assent to the acts done at the meeting,[88] he does not waive irregularities in the notice, and as to him the proceedings are void.

c. Quorum

A majority of all of an indefinite number of persons comprising a society has been held unnecessary to constitute a quorum; and a quorum will be presumed to have been present at a meeting in the absence of proof to the contrary. A quorum is not essential to adjournment.

At common law a majority of all the members of an association is ordinarily not necessary to constitute a quorum, where the society is composed of an indefinite number of persons.[89] In any event, where an association, composed of an indefinite number of members, has no rule prescribing the number that shall constitute a quorum, but has been accustomed to hold its meeting pursuant to notices published in the newspapers, and to transact business thereat, regardless of the number in attendance, the members attending any such meeting constitute a quorum.[90]

Where the members attending a meeting constitute a quorum, the withdrawal from the meeting of a minority of such members because of dissatisfaction with the action of the majority does not affect the right of those remaining to proceed with the transaction of business.[91]

It is not essential to the validity of the proceedings of a society that the record should show that a quorum was present, since a quorum may be presumed to have been present unless the contrary appears.[92]

Adjournment of meeting. In the absence of anything to the contrary in the laws of the society, a meeting may properly be adjourned to a future day by the members in attendance, although they constitute less than a quorum.[93]

d. Conduct of Meetings

(1) In general
(2) Voting

(1) In General

Parliamentary rules govern the conduct of meetings of an association, in the absence of provisions in its own laws as to such matter or of a contrary usage.

In the absence of any provisions in the laws of an association prescribing the manner in which its meetings shall be conducted, common parliamentary principles in use by all deliberative assemblies may be resorted to in considering the regularity of the proceedings;[94] but the fact that strict parliamentary usages are not observed will not invalidate the proceedings, where the society is not attempting to act under parliamentary rules.[95] So, where an association has no constitution or by-laws, any usage in relation to meetings is entitled to consideration in determining questions relating thereto.[96]

The regularity of the proceedings is presumed in the absence of a showing to the contrary.[97]

The president of an association cannot prevent the transaction of business either by leaving the meeting[98] or by refusing to put a motion, duly made and seconded,[99] and in case of such refusal, the vice president may properly put the motion, although the president is still in the chair.[1]

(2) Voting

In the absence of provisions in the laws of an association regulating the matter, voting is controlled by general rules of parliamentary law.

When not prescribed by the laws of the association, a vote on a motion, duly put, may be taken in any of the modes by which such questions are determined under the general rules of parliamentary law.[2] Accordingly, members present and not voting are to be counted as voting in the affirmative,[3] where the majority of those voting vote in the affirmative,[4] provided, however, the question is put by the proper officer.[5]

The fact that illegal votes were cast will not invalidate the result if they do not change the majority.[6]

Where a majority of the members of an unincorporated association having no by-laws are present at a meeting. and the majority of those present vote favorably on a resolution, the resolution is duly passed, although those voting in favor of it do not constitute a majority of the total membership.[7]

e. Adjourned Meetings

Where there is nothing to the contrary in its laws, an association may adjourn its meetings in accordance with common parliamentary rules, and may hold an adjourned meeting without notice to those absent from the previous meeting.

In the absence of anything to the contrary in the laws of the society, an association may adjourn its meetings from time to time according to the usual method of parliamentary bodies,[8] and may transact business at an adjourned meeting without notice to those who were absent from the previous meeting.[9]

§ 19. Officers, Agents, and Committees

a. In general
b. Appointment and election
c. Qualification and bond
d. Term of office
e. Removal or resignation of officers; vacation of office

a. In General

An association may exist without officers. While the members of an association may appoint agents for themselves as individuals, it has been said that an association cannot as such appoint an agent.

An association may exist without officers,[10] and it cannot, as such, appoint an agent,[11] although its members may do so for themselves individually.[12]

b. Appointment and Election

(1) In general
(2) Judicial interference

(1) In General

The appointment or election of officers may be controlled by the articles of association and by-laws, by usage, or by ordinary rules of parliamentary law. An election held in substantial violation of applicable rules or laws is void, although mere irregularities not affecting the result of an election will not invalidate it.

In the absence of any rules to the contrary, an association acting through its members may elect such officers as it chooses.[13] The election is ordinarily regulated by the articles of association or constitution and the by-laws of the association,[14] or, if none such exist, by the usages of the association and the resolutions adopted by it from time to time,[15] and in the absence of all these, resort may be had to the rules of parliamentary law in common use in all deliberative assemblies.[16]

An election held in substantial violation of applicable by-laws, rules, or provisions of law is invalid.[17] Thus, where the power of election is conferred on the board of directors, it must be exercised by the full board, and an election held at a meeting of which all the directors had not been notified is void.[18] However, mere irregularities in the conduct of an election which do not affect the result will not invalidate the election;[19] and, it has been held, where the election is by the members, the fact that the polls are kept open beyond the time prescribed by the constitution will not vitiate the election, if only those entitled to vote participate therein.[20] Regularity of the procedure may be presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary.[21] Where it affirmatively appears that an officer was duly elected in compliance with applicable rules and constitutional

Where a by-law of an association declared one year as the official term of the president of the association, the election of a president prior to the termination of the term of a previously duly elected president, who has not resigned or been removed, is void.—Societa Italiana Progresso Duca Degli Abruzzi v. provisions, his election may not be successfully challenged.[22]

Power to set aside election. A by-law providing that the executive board shall serve as a court of appeal, to which shall be referred for final action all matters of difference that may arise, does not empower the board to set aside an election of officers.[23]

(2) Judicial Interference

The general rule that courts will not interfere with the internal management of an association, in the absence of fraud or prior exhaustion of remedies available within the framework of the organization, applies in respect of election of officers, although in a proper case judicial relief may be secured.

In accordance with the general rules as to judicial interference, which will be considered in § 34, the decision of an unincorporated association on the question of an election to office is a matter peculiarly and exclusively to be determined by the association, and, in the absence of fraud, is final and binding on the courts [24]

In any event, before members of a voluntary association can invoke the aid of the courts to secure them in offices to which they claim to have been elected, it must be shown that they have exhausted the remedies available to them within the association and according to its rules,[25] and the right to hold office in a society with no salary or emolument is not such a right as can be made the basis of a civil suit to contest an election thereto, where the person deprived of the office loses no civil or property right for which he could claim damages.[26] However, the court has jurisdiction, at the suit of certain members of an association against their associates, to prevent the latter from violating the terms of the agreement of the association, and to avoid an illegal election by them of a person to office, and to restrain such person from acting as an officer,[27] and, where one is deprived of the right to run for office in violation of associate regulations, equity will afford relief.[28]

c. Qualification and Bond

(1) In general

(2) Bond and liability of sureties

(1) In General

Persons elected to the office of trustee of a society may perform the duties of such office without first complying with statutory regulations as to filing a certificate of election.

A statute requiring the clerk of certain societies to deposit in the county recorder's office a certificate of election of trustees has been held not to make such action on the part of the clerk a prerequisite to the exercise of the duties of trustees by those who have been elected to such office [29]

(2) Bond and Liability of Sureties

Where a bond of office is given, it stands for the security of the association, irrespective of changes in membership, and the sureties on such a bond may be held in accordance with the general rules governing such matters.

A bond given to an association by one of its officers stands for the security of the society, whoever

Notice of meeting held sufficient

A resolution declaring the executive secretaryship of a state league of municipalities vacant, adopted at the same meeting prior to defendant's election to office, was not defective because notice of the meeting did not specify the election to be one of the purposes of the meeting, where notice clearly comprehended action that might remove the incumbent secretary.—Tonkin v. Kenworthy, 170 A. 233, 112 N J.Law 274.

Notice to and function of advisory board

(1) The right of the executive secretary of a state league of municipalities to hold office could not be challenged because notice of the meeting called for the purpose of an election was not given to the members of the advisory board, where the league constitution vested authority to select the secretary exclusively in the executive board—Tonkin v. Kenworthy, 170 A. 233, 112 N J Law 274.

(2) Under the constitution of a state league of municipalities, authorizing the advisory board to participate in the discussion of all questions at the meetings of the executive board, the advisory board was limited to the discussion of questions of policy relating to municipal action, administration, and problems and advancement of common welfare of the member municipalities, but could exercise no right in the selection of the league's officers—Tonkin v. Kenworthy, supra.

Eligibility as affected by incumbency of another office

The right of the executive secretary of a state league of municipalities to office could not be challenged on the ground that, when appointed, he was president of the league, since he was not required to resign the presidency to be an eligible candidate for the secretaryship—Tonkin v Kenworthy, 170 A. 233, 112 N J. Law 274.

may be its members for the time being, and although its membership may be constantly changing.[30] Where the by-laws of an association provide for a bond by trustees, the acceptance of the bond by the society is a sufficient approval of it.[31]

Although the by-laws require three sureties, yet a bond signed by only a principal and two sureties is valid if accepted and approved by the society, and the sureties cannot complain if they signed without any understanding that a third surety was to sign.[32] When an officer of an association is reelected and becomes his own successor, and at the commencement of his second term reports a certain sum in his hands and gives bond with sureties to account for and pay over the moneys coming into his hands during the term, his sureties will be responsible for the sum so reported in his hands, and will not be allowed to show that the defalcation occurred during the previous term.[33] An association is not bound by the false statements of one of its members, made in open meeting to one who is about to become a surety on a bond of the treasurer of the association, unless he has general authority to represent the association in taking bonds or special authority to represent the association as to the bond in question.[34] The failure of an association to give information to the surety on its treasurer's bond of facts of which the surety was ignorant does not relieve the surety from liability if such information was as accessible to him as it was to the association.[35] It is not the duty of an association or of its officers to require its treasurer to keep the association funds in any particular manner or depository, and the fact that the treasurer has failed to keep such funds separate from his own does not constitute a defense to an action against his surety.[36] A settlement or adjustment of a defalcation provided for by a resolution of the association, if not carried into effect, will not operate to discharge the surety on the defaulting officer's bond.[37]

Joint and several bonds. Where the by-laws of an association provide that the trustees shall give a joint or several bond as security, the trustees may unite in a joint bond, or each trustee may give a several bond,[38] and in the latter event, the sureties on the several bond of one of the trustees may be held liable for the personal default of their principal.[39] The sureties on a several continuing bond, given by one of the trustees of an association when the by-laws provided that the bonds of a trustee should be joint or several, are not holden after the society has changed its by-laws so as to require the trustees to give a joint and several bond.[40]

The term of an officer of an association is regulated as to duration by the laws and usages of the association, or, in the absence of either, by the pleasure of the association. An officer elected for a definite term may hold over until election and qualification of his successor.

If the laws of an association prescribe the duration of the term of an officer, such provision is controlling.[41] In the absence of any such provision, the tenure of an officer is to be determined from the usages and resolutions of the society.[42] If the duration of the term of office is fixed neither by the laws of the association, nor by its usages or resolutions, the officer holds his position merely at the pleasure of the association,[43] or at the pleasure of the particular board charged with his selection.[44]

Where the date on which his term is to commence is stated in the ballot by which an officer is elected, such date controls, although the office was vacant at the time of the election and might have been filled from that date.[45]

Holding over. An officer elected for a definite term holds over until the election and qualification of his successor,[46] at least as against third persons, where the association continues to recognize the officer as such after the time prescribed for a new election has passed without action on its part.[47]

e. Removal or Resignation of Officers; Vacation of Office

An officer holding tenure merely at the pleasure of the association may be removed without cause or prior notice, although an association officer is entitled to notice where he is to be removed for cause, and, where elected for a definite term, he cannot be removed before its expiration without cause and an opportunity to be heard. An officer is impliedly removed by the election of another to fill his place, and his resignation may become effective without formal acceptance. Irregularities in the removal of an officer are subject to waiver.

In the absence of anything to the contrary in the laws, usages, or resolutions of an association concerning the tenure of office, an officer holds his position merely at the pleasure of the association, and may be removed without either cause or notice,[48] although where he is removed for cause, he is entitled to a hearing,[49] and when he has been elected for a definite term, he can be removed only for adequate cause and after an investigation of the charges against him, of which he has been given proper notice, and to which he has been allowed an opportunity to reply[50]

An officer of an unincorporated association can be removed from an office to which he was elected by the votes of the members only by the body which elected him[51]

The action of members will not be sustained where, having withdrawn from a regular meeting merely on account of opposition to the duly elected officers, they meet and pass a resolution expelling the latter from office, and constituting themselves their successors;[52] but where officers themselves secede with no intention of further continuing to hold their positions, the remaining members, although a minority of the association, are at liberty to consider the offices vacant and to fill the same by election[53]

A formal removal may not be necessary, the incumbent of an office is impliedly removed by the election of another person to fill his place.[54]

An officer does not vacate his office by joining a rival association, although the constitution of the latter organization provides that no member thereof shall remain a member of any similar association.[55]

The resignation of a member of the executive committee of an association may become effective without a formal acceptance thereof.[56]

Waiver of irregularities. Although the removal of an officer is irregular, yet where he acquiesces therein, and makes no further claim to the office, he loses all official power.[57]

Damages for wrongful removal. No action for damages for wrongful suspension of an officer will lie against members of a committee, where an appeal has been taken to the proper association tribunal and the matter has passed out of the jurisdiction of the committee.[58]

"The executive committee of the Kansas State Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry, a voluntary association, such committee having authority to suspend an officer who proved inefficient or derelict in the discharge of duty, made an order suspending the worthy lecturer without having first given her an opportunity to be heard. She appealed to the state grange, which took no direct action on the appeal, but sustained a ruling of the presiding officer that a motion to hear her thereon was out of order The record of the suspension recited that it was made 'pending further investigation,' and the committee prepared for a formal hearing, but abandoned it on the ground that the appeal had deprived them of jurisdiction. Held, that the action of the state grange amounted to an affirmance of the order of suspension, and was conclusive upon the appellant, and that, if the officer's legal rights were invaded, her injury was at the hands of the grange, and that no action would lie against the members of the committee on account thereof."—Burton v Dickson, 180 P 216, 104 Kan 594, rehearing denied 180 P. 775, 104 Kan 594.

ities of the officers of an association find their basis in applicable provisions of its constitution or by-laws, usage, and general principles of law. An officer may not exercise a power which the constitution grants exclusively to a board of directors or to the member clubs of the association.[59]

b. Right to Funds, Books, and Records

The duly elected or de facto officers of an association or its trustees are ordinarily entitled to custody of its funds and records, although they may waive the right to custody thereof.

The proper officers of an association are entitled to custody of its funds,[60] and of its books and records.[61] Officers elected and installed, and actually exercising their official functions, may be entitled to custody of the association's funds, irrespective of the validity of their election.[62]

Where an association by unanimous vote appropriates money for a certain purpose, and the committee authorized to expend the fund incurs liabilities on the faith of the appropriation, their right to the fund thereupon becomes vested, and cannot be divested by the subsequent dissent of a member of the society [63]

It seems that it is no defense to an action by the president of a voluntary association to recover a fund from its former officers that it has been applied by a minority to the general purpose for which the association was organized, since the majority is entitled to control.[64]

Persons otherwise entitled to the custody of a fund as trustees for an association may by waiver lose their right to recover the same at law from a member of the society who holds the fund for the use of all members [65]

Former officer's duty to turn over bank book and money

Where officers of an association have been elected and installed, and are exercising the functions and powers of their respective offices, a former officer possessing a bank book and money admitted to be the property of the association cannot restrain such officers from demanding such property on the ground that the election was invalid, as he would incur no responsibility by turning over such property to the acting officers of the association —Smith v. (3) Execution of powers
(4) Ratification of unauthorized acts

(1) In General

The officers and agents of an association may bind it when acting within their powers, which are ordinarily prescribed by the articles of association, constitution, or by-laws. An association creating a subsidiary or branch may be liable for the acts of the latter.

The acts of the officers and committees of an association, within their prescribed powers, are binding on the association.[66] The power of the officers of a voluntary association to bind it, while sometimes conferred by statute, as will appear from an examination of statutory provisions and the cases cited below,[67] is generally determinable from its articles of association or constitution, and its by-laws [68] Regard may be had also to the usages of the association and to its objects or purposes, especially where the society has adopted no laws or where the laws adopted are silent on the subject [69]

Where power to bind the association is not conferred either expressly or by implication of fact, the court, in determining whether such power exists, will apply the principles of law applicable to partnership or to agency, according to whether the association is formed for profit or not, as will more fully appear from an examination of the following subsection (2) (b).

Whether or not a committee has power to bind the association is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury.[70]

Branch or subsidiary associations Where a voluntary association creates a subsidiary or branch association as an instrumentality through which to accomplish certain purposes, it is liable for the acts of such subsidiary association to the same extent as though such acts had been done by the entire membership [71]

(2) Power to Bind by Contract
(a) In general
(b) Nature and extent of power
(c) Liability of association in quasi contract

(a) In General

A duly authorized officer of an association may by contract bind all the associates including himself.

If an officer, having authority to do so, enters into a contract for, and in behalf of, the association, he thereby binds all the associates,[72] including himself,[73] but an officer cannot bind the association or its members by a contract which he is not authorized to make.[74]

Conveyance by trustees chosen under common law and not under statute

Where members of voluntary, fraternal, nonbusiness association authorized duly elected trustees of the association to convey property to a certain person, to enable such person to execute a mortgage to avoid foreclosure under the existing mortgage, the mortgage so executed for such purpose was enforceable in equity, although the successors to the previous trustees of the association were not appointed by register, under Code (1907) § 6098, since such statute was not exclusive, the association having a common-law right to elect their trustees to act on behalf of the association, and to hold its properties.—Hope of Alabama Lodge of Odd Fellows v. Mortgage executed by de facto trustee

Where a fraternal, nonbusiness association continued to function as such, notwithstanding a prior incorporation in which less than a majority of the membership had participated, and a majority of its members, after a meeting duly called for that purpose, authorized duly elected trustees to convey the association's property to a certain person to enable such person to mortgage the property, or procure an extension of an existing mortgage, in order to prevent foreclosure of the existing mortgage, the conveyance to such person and the mortgage executed by him for such purpose will be enforced in equity, even if such trustees were not de jure trustees, since the person to whom the land was conveyed for such purpose was a de facto trustee—Hope of Alabama Lodge of Odd Fellows v. Chambless, 103 So 54, 212 Ala. 444.

(b) Nature and Extent of Power

Acts of officers within the scope of the powers ordinarily conferred upon such officers will, in general, be deemed the acts of the association. While the officers and agents of an association engaged in business are, ordinarily, presumed to have authority to bind the association as to matters within the scope of such business, in the case of an association formed for moral, benevolent, political, or other noncommercial purposes, authority of its officers or agents to bind the members will not ordinarily be presumed from the existence of their general power to act for the association.

In the absence of evidence tending to show a limitation of their power, acts of the officers of an association within the scope of the powers ordinarily conferred upon such officers will be deemed to have been the acts of the association.[75] The power of officers to bind the association by particular contracts may be implied from general powers expressly conferred upon them.[76] The members of a state grange are not liable in contract to a member of a local grange for misrepresentations in the sale of goods made by an agent appointed by the former.[77]

If an association at a meeting of its members confers power upon one person to do an act, his authority is superior to and supersedes a power to do the same act previously conferred upon another person by the society's board of trustees.[78]

Purpose of association as determining authority. In determining whether or not an officer has authority to bind the association, it is material to consider the nature of the society and its object and purpose. An association engaged in commercial enterprises involving profit and loss being in many respects a partnership in legal effect (supra § 1), the authority of its officers to bind it by contract is governed by the law applicable to partnerships, and accordingly, its officers and agents are presumed to have authority to make in its behalf any contract within the scope of the business for the prosecution of which the association was formed, and the association is bound by such a contract so made.[79]

If, on the other hand, an association is formed, not for profit, but for moral, social, benevolent, literary, scientific, political, recreative, or other like purpose, its liability on contracts made by its officers or committees depends on the principles of the law of agency, and authority to create such a liability will not be presumed or implied from the existence of a general power to attend to or transact the business, or to promote the objects for which the association was formed,[80] except, it has been held, where the obligation contracted is necessary for the preservation of the society,[81] or where the fund for payment of the obligation has already been provided.[82]

(c) Liability of Association in Quasi Contract

An association receiving the benefits of articles furnished or labor performed may be held liable therefor on a contract implied in law.

Although the association may not be liable on a contract made by an officer or agent, yet, if it receives the benefit of articles furnished[83] or labor performed[84] thereunder, it is liable for the reasonable value or worth thereof on a contract implied in law, independently of any question of ratification of the unauthorized contract of the officer or agent.

(3) Execution of Powers

Officers of an association acting under limited powers can bind the society only by acts strictly conforming to the powers conferred.

Where the officers of an association act under special and limited powers, their acts must be in strict conformity therewith or the society will not be bound rendered services in writing individual policies on each member of the association payable to it, the constitution and by-laws of the association showing no authority in the officers to make such a contract.—Coney v. Brennan, 167 N.Y.S. 903.

thereby.[85] So, where the board of directors has been authorized to settle the affairs of an association, it has been held that the full board must be present at the settlement, and that a majority alone cannot act,[86] although where the power to act is expressly, or by necessary implication, conferred upon an executive committee, it may bind the association just as a board of directors would bind a corporation.[87]

Where certain officers of the society have been authorized to negotiate a sale of its property, they must act jointly in order to bind it,[88] but, where a committee has been authorized to do an act, it is usually held that the act of the majority is to be taken as the act of the whole, unless there is something in the delegation of authority to the contrary,[89] and the same rule applies where managers are appointed to conduct the association's business, at least where the duty to be performed is ministerial;[90] and in this connection it has been held that discretionary powers of an executive committee may not be delegated.[91]

One member of a board of directors cannot exercise a power conferred upon the board,[92] unauthorized representations of one member of a committee are not the acts of the committee, so as to bind the association.[93] The fact that a member of an unincorporated association who indorsed a note executed to the association was also its treasurer would not make the assignment of the note one by the association, especially where he did not sign as such.[94]

(4) Ratification of Unauthorized Acts

A contract or other act of the representative of an association which was originally unauthorized may become valid and binding on due ratification thereof, although acts falling short of due ratification will not suffice.

Although the contract or other act of an officer, agent, or committee of an association was originally unauthorized, yet the society may ratify it and thus become bound thereby,[95] as where the association accepts the benefits of the unauthorized transaction.[96]

The approval of an unauthorized act does not amount to ratification unless the association had knowledge of all the material facts;[97] and, where the ratification is based on the approval given by members at a meeting of the society, it must appear that the meeting was regularly called[98] The approval of an unauthorized contract subject to changes which are never made does not render the contract binding on the society,[99] and knowledge and approval by the members of a law and order league of the retainer by its officers of a lawyer to prosecute violations of the law will not render them personally liable for the services, if they had no reason to suppose that the employment was on their credit, but expected the expenses to be met by individual contributions placed at the disposal of their officers for that purpose[1]

An unauthorized act cannot be ratified by a person or body of persons who could not have authorized the act in the first instance.[2]

d. Duties and Liabilities

(1) As to members
(2) As to third persons

(1) As to Members

The officers of an association are bound to act for the common interest of all members, should not reap secret profits at the expense of the association, and may be held personally liable for breach of their obligations toward the members of the association.

The officers of a voluntary association are bound to act for the promotion of the common interest of all members,[3] as by refusing to participate in an authorized transaction,[4] and they are individually liable to their associates for fraud or breach of trust in the conduct of the society's affairs.[5] Accordingly, they will not be allowed to reap secret profits from surreptitious dealings with or for the association, but will be compelled to account therefor at the suit of other members.[6]

Officers are liable to their associates for the conversion of property belonging to the society,[7] and an action may be maintained against the treasurer of an association to recover funds converted by him,[8] or against a former treasurer for moneys which he has refused to pay over to his successor on demand.[9]

(2) As to Third Persons
(a) Authorized contracts
(b) Unauthorized contracts
(c) Torts

(a) Authorized Contracts

While officers of an association are generally held personally liable on contracts made by them with third persons in behalf of the association, the presumption of their liability is merely one of fact, and they may escape individual responsibility on proof that credit was extended to the association and not to the officers as individuals. An agent not a member nor an officer of the association incurs no personal responsibility through contracting with a third person in behalf of his disclosed principal, the association, unless he unequivocally charges himself with liability.

It has been shown above in this section that, where an officer of an association, having authority to do so, enters into a contract in its behalf, he thereby binds all members of the society, including himself. In this event, if his liability is merely that of a member, it can be enforced only in conjunction with the liability of his associates in a suit against all, or against a few as representatives of all, or, under some statutes, in a suit against prescribed officers of the association, or against the association in its own name, as will be explained in § 36 infra.

It is generally held, however, that apart from his liability as a member, an officer who enters into a contract in behalf of the association is liable thereon as an individual, irrespective of the liability of the associate members,[10] although he does not intend to render himself liable,[11] and believes that the law does not render him so.[12] This is especially true, where he makes the contract in his individual capacity,[13] or where credit is given to him individually.[14]

But the inference that the officer binds himself is merely one of fact,[15] the question whether credit is given to the officer or to the association being for the determination of the jury,[16] and it does not follow, as a matter of law, that, in every case where the officer of a voluntary unincorporated association makes a contract with a third person in behalf of the association, he thereby renders himself personally liable.[17] On the contrary, where the officer does not contract in his individual capacity, or on his individual credit, but credit is given to the association, he is not liable on the contract except as a member in common with his associates.[18]

Where one who makes a contract professedly in behalf of an association pursuant to authority is not a member or an officer of the society, but a mere agent, he is, of course, not liable thereon,[19] any more than the agent of any other disclosed principal, unless he unequivocally charges himself with the obligation.[20]

(b) Unauthorized Contracts

An officer attempting to make an unauthorized contract in behalf of the association may be solely and individually bound. Under decisions regarding a contract purportedly in the name of an association as made in behalf of a principal unable to contract, the officer or agent entering into such contract is personally bound.

If an officer, in making a contract in the association's behalf, acts without authority or in excess of his authority, the association is not bound thereby, and accordingly, he is not bound in his capacity as a member (supra § 15), but he is bound individually on the contract, and may be proceeded against alone.[21]

There are also authorities to the effect that since an association is not a legal entity and therefore lacks

Distribution committee not liable under facts

Where claimant of a reward had no dealings with a committee selected by a banker's association to distribute a reward, and where such committee's only function was to make distribution of the reward, the dissatisfied claimant could not recover of the committee even if its distribution was improperly made, as the committee members were not personally liable to such claimant, and under the facts the rule that agents of an unincorporated association may be personally liable for their acts in behalf of such association was wholly inapplicable.—Bird v Barrett, 224 N.W. 556, 207 Iowa 1158.

capacity to contract as such, a contract made in its name by an officer or agent is in effect a contract made by an agent in behalf of a principal without power to contract, and, therefore, binds the officer of the association individually, just as in the case of a contract made by any other agent of a principal without contractual capacity.[22]

(c) Torts

An officer of an association may be held liable for a tort committed in the course of his duties It has been held beyond the power of an officer to recover, as owner, for a tortious injury to property of the associates used by the officer. The right of an officer to limit his liability for injury to an employee has been denied.

Officers of an association are liable, as such, for a tort committed by them in the course of their duties.[23]

An officer of an unincorporated association, for whose use an automobile has been purchased and "registered" in the name of the association, has been denied the right to recover as owner for damages thereto.[24]

Limitation of liability. While the officers and trustees of an unincorporated association may limit their liability as to some torts, and even relieve the trust estate as to some, they cannot by contract exempt themselves from personal liability to an employee for injuries suffered by him through the negligence of other employees.[25]

§ 21. —— Compensation and Reimbursement

In the absence of an express contract an officer or committee member may be denied compensation for his services. An officer will be denied reimbursement for expenses incurred by him in the execution of an illegally voted dissolution of the association.

In the absence of an express contract a member of a committee is not entitled to compensation for his services.[26]

The treasurer of an association will not be allowed for expenses incurred by him in carrying out an illegal vote to dissolve the association, nor for the costs and expenses of an equity suit brought by members to restrain him from carrying into effect the illegal vote.[27] Where, notwithstanding an association's contention, as defense to plaintiff's action for salary as manager, clerk, and bookkeeper that the agreement was that plaintiff should receive a salary only if the association made a yearly profit and the evidence showed that such a profit had been made, plaintiff was held entitled to a salary.[28]

§ 22. Membership

a. Transfer of membership
b. Estoppel to deny membership
c. Contracts between members

a. Transfer of Membership

Membership in a voluntary association is not transferable in the absence of assent by the association, as through provision of its constitution or by-laws.

These decisions apparently overlook the point that a contract made in the name of an association may be construed as one made in behalf of all the members, and that under the latter construction the officer would be agent for the various members of the association and might therefore represent principals capable of contracting.

Under a strict construction of Massachusetts statutes, it has been held that, where an automobile was purchased by the members of an unincorporated association, for the use of an officer thereof, and registered in the name of the association, no one could recover against a third party for damages to such automobile. Suit brought by the officer was amended so as to make the true owners, that is, the members of the association, the plaintiffs, but the court held such amendment ineffectual, taking the view that as the car was registered in the name of the association instead of the individual members as owners in common, it was not registered in the name of the "owner" and was, therefore, a trespasser on the highways of Massachusetts, for damage to which no recovery could be had under Massachusetts justice; and pointing out that, even if registration in the name of the association was construed as in the name of the individual members as owners in common, recovery would still be denied, because the membership had changed intermediate the registration and the accident, and there had been no new registration in the names of the new owners, or members, as required by statute.—Hanley v American Ry. Express Co, 138 N.E. 323, 244 Mass. 248.
A broader construction of the Massachusetts motor vehicle registration statutes would deny recovery for damages to an improperly registered vehicle only where there was an actual intent to violate the registration law, and under such a construction recovery could have been permitted under the amended complaint in the above case, inasmuch as no actual intent to violate registration acts was shown. The decision seems sound, however, in so far as it denies to an officer of an association the right to recover as individual owner for damages to property owned in common by the members

Evidence justified findings and conclusions denying the secretary of an unincorporated voluntary association recovery of salary against other individual members, where it was shown that he relied on the earnings of the association for his salary and that such earnings were insufficient.—Fuller v. 28. Genco v. Union Berry & Truck Ass'n, (La.App.) 167 So. 890, setting aside order dismissing appeal 166 So. 888.

The right of membership in a voluntary association is not transferable,[29] unless the association assents thereto;[30] and hence, the transferee has no rights, as such, except what the association chooses to accord him.[31] However, the laws of the association may authorize the disposition of membership privileges, and the substitution of the transferee as a member on his signing the articles of association.[32]

b. Estoppel to Deny Membership

An association is not estopped to deny that an expelled associate was ever a member where he was not thereby misled to his injury. A person may be estopped to deny membership in an association.

An association is not equitably estopped, as against one whom it had expelled from membership, to deny that he had ever been a member, where he was not misled to his injury by such action on the part of the society.[33] However, a person may be estopped to deny his membership in an association.[34]

c. Contracts between Members

Contracts between members may be subject to the regulations of the association.

Contracts between members of an association as to matters within the scope of the associate purpose have been held subject to associate rules and regulations.[35]

Arbitration. Where provision therefor is made in the articles of association, it is competent for members to make valid and binding agreements to submit to arbitration questions in dispute connected with their membership.[36]

§ 23. —— Admission of Members

a. In general
b. When membership arises

a. In General

As a general rule, admission to membership in a voluntary association is a matter within the complete and exclusive jurisdiction of the association. Where, however, one duly elected has been arbitrarily denied admission, he may secure judicial relief.

The grant or refusal of membership in a voluntary association is a matter within the complete control of the organization,[37] which has the power to enact laws governing the admission of members,[38] and to place restrictions on the right of admission.[39]

In other words, membership is a privilege which the society may accord or withhold at its pleasure, and a court of equity will not interfere to compel the admission of a person not regularly elected,[40] even though the arbitrary rejection of the candidate may prejudice his material interests,[41] where no rights of property or of person are affected, and no rights of citizenship are infringed on.[42]

Where, however, one has been duly elected to membership in an association, but is arbitrarily denied admission, he acquires a legal right to membership which may be enforced by the appropriate remedy,[43] as by mandamus, the availability of which writ in such cases being reserved for consideration in § 238 of the title Mandamus [38 C. J. p 824 note 49–p 825 note 65].

b. When Membership Arises

One may become a member of an association by formally signing its articles, or in any other way that shows a mutual agreement between himself and the existing members that he is a member. But membership is a question of intent and cannot be established by any facts which fail to show the existence of a mutual intent that one shall be a member of the association.

Ordinarily, a person becomes a member by signing the articles of association or constitution of the society,[44] and that is all that is necessary.[45]

On the other hand, a person may become a member without going through the formality of signing the articles of association or constitution. It is sufficient if the existing members agree to accept him as a member, and he agrees to become such, with the mutual understanding that he shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges incidental to membership, and shall assume all the duties and obligations attaching thereto,[46] the question of membership depending on the intent and understanding of the parties.[47]

One cannot, however, become a member unless he either signs or in some way assents to its laws,[48] and the mere purchase of realty of a member of a telephone association will not of itself confer membership in the association on the purchaser,[49] nor will deposit of money with the conditional intent of acquiring membership in a colony make one a member thereof.[50]

Whether a person is or is not a member of an association is a question of fact for the jury.[51]

§ 24. —— Withdrawal of Members

The laws of an association as to the withdrawal of members are, ordinarily, controlling. In the absence of a statute or a law of the association to the contrary, a member may usually withdraw at will, subject to any existing pecuniary obligations. Withdrawal may be effected by a transfer of membership to another, although it will not be accomplished ordinarily by an abortive attempt to dissolve the association, nor by failure to exercise rights or fulfill obligations of membership, nor by joining another and similar organization.

The laws of the association sometimes provide for the withdrawal of members, in which case there can be no withdrawal except in the manner and on the conditions prescribed,[52] but, in the absence of any statute or any law of the association to the contrary, a member may resign or withdraw from the society at his pleasure,[53] and no acceptance of his resignation or withdrawal is necessary to terminate his membership, where he is under no pecuniary obligation to his associates, although an insolvent association may properly refuse to accept the withdrawal of a member until he has discharged his proportion of its indebtedness.[54]

A member may terminate his connection with the association by transferring his interest therein to another member with the society's assent.[55]

The fact that several members attempt to dissolve the association by forming a corporation for the same purpose and under the same name does not constitute a withdrawal from the association,[56] but, where an association formed a division of a national society, which prescribed and could alone change its constitution, and an opposition national society was formed, which adopted an organization and a constitution, which, while similar in their main features, differed in material respects from those of the old society, and a large majority of the members of the association favored the new society, and adopted its constitution, and attempted, in opposition to the minority, to take over to it the division as an organized body, and, claiming to be the original association, took possession of its property and maintained and carried on an organization as a division of the new society, the majority ceased to be members of the old society.[57]

The mere failure of a member to exercise the rights of membership,[58] or to participate in the management of the business of the association,[59] or to pay dues,[60] does not terminate his membership; nor is membership forfeited by joining another similar organization.[61]

§ 25. —— Expulsion, Suspension or Exclusion of Members

a. In general
b Power of association
c. Grounds
d Procedure
e Judicial interference to prevent suspension or expulsion
f. Right to damages for wrongful suspension or expulsion

a. In General

The constitution or by-laws of an association may provide for expulsion of members; but one owning a membership of pecuniary value may not be deprived thereof, except in compliance with applicable provisions of the laws of the association.

The laws of the association sometimes provide that the membership of any associate may be terminated by the unanimous vote of his fellow members,[62] but the usual method by which an association terminates a membership is by formally expelling the member.

Where the interest which one acquires by membership is of substance and value in a business aspect, and not merely sentimental or social in nature, he may not be deprived of membership, except by proceedings in accordance with the laws of the association.[63]

Where the members of an unincorporated association adopted a resolution to incorporate, and a certificate of incorporation was filed and subsequently ratified, but no notice was given to the members, and the action was without statutory or contractual authority, it was held that a member of the association who became a member of the corporation did not thereby lose his membership in the association nor his interest in the association's property—Great Council of Improved Order of Red Men of State of New Jersey v. Hurley, 299 S. W 604, 222 Mo App. 51.

63. Grassi Bros v. O'Rourke, 153 N Y S. 493, 89 Misc. 234.

The resolution of a community that a member has severed his connection with it and can no longer be recognized as a member does not constitute an expulsion of which he can complain, where this is based on his voluntary withdrawal, in violation of his contract and without recognizing the established practice of the community with reference to outgoing members.[64]

b. Power of Association

An association has the power to establish rules relative to exclusion of members and may suspend or expel a member for cause. If such power is vested in the association as a body, it may not be delegated, although under appropriate association laws the power of expulsion or suspension may be exercised by a committee.

An association has inherent power to suspend or expel a member for cause,[65] and an association has power to establish rules for the expulsion of members,[66] and the power of expulsion, especially in the case of noncommercial associations, is frequently conferred by the articles of association or constitution, the provisions of which are binding alike on the members and on the association.[67]

Accordingly, an association not organized for profit may lawfully expel a member on adequate grounds, although it may own property[68] and the membership may have a pecuniary value.[69]

The laws of the association may and frequently do vest the power of expulsion in a board of directors, governing committee, or other like body.[70] If the power of expulsion is vested in the association as a body, however, it cannot be delegated,[71] although it is immaterial that the order of expulsion is made by a committee where it is ratified by the association.[72]

c. Grounds

(1) In general
(2) Implied grounds
(3) Grounds prescribed by laws of association

(1) In General

Although, generally speaking, membership can be terminated only for the member's violation of duty or breach of the society's laws, yet it is competent for the articles of association to provide for expulsion of a member for mere business reasons rendering his continuance as a member undesirable.

While, as a general rule, membership in an association cannot be terminated by the society save for some violation of duty on the part of the member, either as a citizen or as a member, or for some breach on his part of the society's laws, yet it is competent for the association to provide in its articles of association or constitution that the membership of any person may be terminated by a unanimous vote of his associates if for business reasons merely such membership should be no longer desirable.[73]

(2) Implied Grounds

Broadly speaking, an association has implied power to expel a member for serious misconduct violating his duty either as a member or as a citizen.

It has been said that an association has inherent power to expel a member in three classes of cases, and three only,[74] namely: First, where the member has committed an offense which, while it has no relation to his duty as a member, is of so infamous a nature as to render him unfit for the society of honest men,[75] but before an expulsion is made for

Right to membership as based on agreement and not on common law
The right of membership and rights incident thereto in voluntary unincorporated associations do not flow from the common law, but from the organization agreement, and the power of the association over them is absolute, except where a civil or property right of the member is invaded.—Rogers v. Tangier Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., 198 N.W. 873, 112 Neb. 166.

this cause, the member must have been convicted by a jury according to the law of the land.[76] Second, where the member has committed an offense against his duty as a member;[77] and, accordingly, a member may be expelled for such conduct as clearly violates the fundamental objects of the association, and which, if persisted in and allowed, would thwart those objects or bring the association into disrepute.[78] Third, where the member has committed an offense of a mixed nature, an offense against his duty as a member and also indictable by the law of the land;[79] and in this case the member may be tried and expelled for the violation of his duty as such, although an indictment based on the same transaction is pending against him,[80] and even though he has been tried on an indictment and acquitted.[81]

(3) Grounds Prescribed by Laws of Association

As a general rule, a member may be expelled for violation of a law of the association, providing for expulsion even if unreasonable. Enumeration in the by-laws of specified grounds for expulsion constitutes an implied negation of the existence of other grounds, unless the latter are within the general and inherent power of exclusion.

The laws of an association, if subscribed to, or otherwise assented to, by the members, are in the nature of a contract between each member and his associates (supra § 11), and accordingly, a member may be expelled for a violation of those laws when they so provide,[82] and a provision for expulsion, although unreasonable as a by-law as being against common right, may, if assented to by a member, be binding on him as a contract.[83] A by-law making the board of managers the sole judges of what constitutes misconduct of a member warranting expulsion has been held valid, where it was not pointed out by the expelled member wherein such provision conflicted with any law or was against public policy.[84]

If the laws of the association enumerate certain grounds for expulsion, the right to expel for other grounds, save such as are inherent in the society, as explained in the preceding subsection, is impliedly excluded;[85] and, if the laws of the association

Kissing a female employee while the member was inebriated is misconduct constituting ground for expulsion, as against the contention that such osculatory act constituted an offense against the female employee only and not against the employing association, since such act is contrary to the decorum of the association and, therefore, an offense against it.—Yeomans v. Union League Club of Chicago, 225 Ill.App. 234.

Repeated intoxication.

Where what was done by a fire association in expelling a member for nonpayment of fines was, in regard to notice, hearing, imposition of fines, and expulsion, in accordance with the charter and by-laws, but the indirect cause of expulsion was repeated acts of intoxication, the repeated acts constituted such improper conduct as justified expulsion, and prevented reinstatement under order of court.—State v. Cannot complain of such expulsion.

Where persons enter into a voluntary agreement and form an association to carry out objects thereof, and one member violates the rules of the association and is expelled, he cannot complain if the objects of the association are not contrary to public policy or statutory regulation and the penalty inflicted is not against natural justice and is imposed in pursuance of the regulations of the association.—Elfer v. d. Procedure

(1) In general
(2) Notice
(3) Accusation or charge
(4) Trial or hearing
(5) Waiver of irregularities

(1) In General

Proceedings for the expulsion of members should be conducted in conformity with the rules of the association and the law of the land However, such proceedings are to be considered without too much regard for technicalities and the form of procedure is, ordinarily, immaterial if substantial justice has been done.

A proceeding for expulsion should be conducted in accordance with the laws of the association and the law of the land,[88] thus, if the laws of the society require a two-thirds vote in order to expel a member, an expulsion by a less number is invalid.[89] However, proceedings under articles of association agreed to by all the members are to be considered without too much regard for technicalities, and substantial justice is to be kept in view rather than mere form.[90] The proceedings resulting in the suspension of a member may be summary, so long as he is accorded a fair trial on specific charges with an opportunity to defend.[91]

Prior acquittal. If a member threatened with expulsion from an association has once been tried and acquitted of the charge against him, he may not be tried again for the same offense unless the by-laws clearly and explicitly authorize such procedure.[92]

(2) Notice

While notice of intention to proceed against a member is ordinarily prerequisite to his expulsion, notice may not be required where the laws of the association provide otherwise. The time and mode of service may be governed by applicable provisions of the laws of the association, and it has been held that in the absence of provision as to such matters a member is entitled to reasonable notice personally served.

As a general rule, an association cannot expel a member without first giving him notice of its intention to proceed against him, so as to afford him an opportunity to be heard in defense,[93] even though its laws make no provision for notice;[94] and this is especially true where membership car-

Where by-laws were silent on the question as to whether a member could be tried a second time for the same offense, although they did provide generally for a trial and a vote of the order on the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused, the by-laws were construed as not authorizing a second trial, and the association was without jurisdiction to try a member previously tried and acquitted of the same offense, and could not lawfully expel him therefor—Rueb v Rehder, 174 P. 992, 24 N M. 534, 1 A L R. 423.

Prior acquittal not shown

A member of an association cannot contend that a vote of eight to four of a board of managers, consisting of fifteen members, which vote was in favor of expulsion, was in fact an acquittal, there not being a two-thirds vote, when the facts showed that such vote was preliminary, to give the member an opportunity to resign, and that, when the member refused to resign, the board voted ten to two in favor of expulsion—Yeomans v. Union League Club of Chicago, 225 Ill App. 234.

Notice held insufficient

A letter reading "Gentlemen—You are hereby cited to appear before the executive committee of the Employing Plasterers' Association on Monday, September 22, '13, at 8 o'clock, No 30 West Thirty-Third street." was insufficient as a notice of charges having been preferred against the recipient—Grassi Bros. v O'Rourke, 153 N.Y.S 493, 495, 496, 89 Misc 234.

94. Grassi Bros v. O'Rourke, supra—5 C J. p 1355 note 74

"There is no provision requiring notice of the preferring of charges to be served on an accused member; but there should be, and, since there is not, the law will insert such provision, because it would be repugnant to a sense of justice that an accused should be haled before a trial committee without being apprised of the cause."—Grassi Bros. v. O'Rourke, supra.

ries with it privileges and property rights.[95]

Where, however, the constitution of the association provides for expulsion of a member for a specified cause without trial, notice has been held not prerequisite to expulsion.[96]

Time and mode of service. If the laws of the society prescribe the time of notice, such provision must be strictly observed,[97] if they are silent on the subject reasonable notice must be given.[98]

No different mode being provided, personal service of the notice should be made,[99] even though the accused member has changed his residence without notifying the society of the change.[1]

Proof of notice. One who asserts that a member has been duly expelled bears the burden of proving that the member had due notice of the expulsory proceedings,[2] and this burden is not sustained by testimony of an officer of the association that he inclosed the notice in an envelope, coupled with the testimony of a messenger that he delivered the envelope to the accused member, where the messenger is unable to testify as to the contents of the envelope.[3]

(3) Accusation or Charge

As a rule charges must be preferred against a member prior to his expulsion. The charges should be clear and definite, although technical precision is not essential.

Before a member can be expelled, a charge against him must be made and be clearly stated.[4]

Charges will be deemed sufficiently specific where they advise the member of their nature, and enable him to prepare for his defense,[5] and it is immaterial that the charge is not reduced to writing where the member is fully informed of its nature,[6] or that the charge comes from persons who have no personal knowledge in the matter, and whom he cannot cross-examine, where he is given the right to present anything he may desire in his own behalf, and he is the only witness.[7]

(4) Trial or Hearing

As a general rule, a member cannot be expelled by an association without a fair trial before an impartial tribunal.

Before an accused member can be expelled, he must be given an opportunity to be heard in defense; he is entitled to a trial or hearing on the charges made against him,[8] even though the laws of the association make no provision therefor,[9] and this is especially true where membership entitles him to privileges and property rights.[10]

"While it is true that the constitution and by-laws of a voluntary association constitute the sole rule which governs the relations between the association and its members, and that courts will not redress any action in expelling or suspending a member taken in accordance therewith, such proceedings must be conducted in good faith, upon notice to the accused, and an opportunity to be heard must be accorded him, otherwise, a court of equity will reverse the action of the association and restore him to membership."—Gilmore v. Palmer, 179 N.Y.S. 1, 2, 109 Misc. 552.

9. Fritz v. Muck, 62 How.Pr.(N.Y.) 69.

10. N.J.—Byrne v. Supreme Circle B. U., 65 A. 839, 74 N.J.Law 258.

While a member is entitled to a fair trial conducted in good faith,[11] technical accuracy is not essential;[12] and it has been held that a trial is not essential where the constitution of the association provides for expulsion without trial.[13]

The tribunal before whom the hearing or trial is held must be an impartial one;[14] but the fact that the members who started the investigation participate in rendering the decision does not invalidate the expulsion, where no bad faith is shown;[15] and the refusal to permit a preliminary examination of members constituting the association tribunal for the purpose of determining their competency to try the question of expulsion is no ground for the interference of a court of law.[16]

Adjournment. An accused member who has been duly notified of the proceeding to expel him is not entitled to an adjournment to enable him to make a defense, where he has full knowledge of all the particulars of the charge and yet fails to deny it, or to state that he has witnesses whom he wishes to produce;[17] by merely serving notice that he is unable to attend at the trial, he does not prevent the association from proceeding to expel him.[18]

Evidence. The association is not bound, in the trial of a member, to adhere to the legal rules of evidence applied in courts of law;[19] and it has been held that the admission of hearsay evidence in regard to a fact which has been admitted by the member is no ground for setting aside the expulsion.[20]

Effect of default in appearance. A society has no right, without proving the charges against a member, to expel him merely because he does not appear,[21] and, where an association has no jurisdiction to expel a member for conspiracy against it, the member's failure to appear at the hearing does not confer on the association authority to enter a judgment of expulsion.[22]

(5) Waiver of Irregularities

Irregularities in respect of the trial and procedure relative to expulsion of a member of an association are subject to waiver.

An irregularity in the appointment of a committee to try an accused member is waived by his appearance before the committee without objection.[23] So, it has been held that, where a member appears and examines witnesses without objection to the irregularity of the proceedings, he thereby waives formal notice of the charges against him;[24]

Specific finding as to osculatory misconduct not necessary

A club board need not make a specific finding as to a member's misconduct in kissing the female elevator operator in a club, but may properly expel him on a general finding of misconduct, where it is apparent from the evidence that he became intoxicated and kissed such female.—Yeomans v. Presence in tribunal of man who had prejudged case

Where one of the delegates who composed a trade board and who voted for guilt and recommendation of expulsion was present and participated in the proceedings of the executive committee that acted on the recommendation, the presence and participation of this man, who had formally prejudged the case, would of itself have been sufficient denial of a fair trial to invalidate the expulsion, even if there had otherwise been a proper compliance with the requirement of a due trial on charges.—Grassi Bros. v. However, it has been decided that, although a member attends and enters on a defense, he does not waive his right to a notice of the charges.—Downing v. St. Columbia's R. C. T. A. B. Society, 10 Daly (N.Y.) 262.

and service of a copy of the charges is waived by a member who appears and defends on the merits without objection.[25] Similarly, the exclusion of relevant evidence by the trial committee is waived where the accused member fails to complain of the ruling on the subsequent hearing of the case by the society on the committee's report;[26] and the failure, on the hearing before the society, to read the evidence taken by the committee is waived where the member does not ask to have it read.[27]

e. Judicial Interference to Prevent Suspension or Expulsion

As a general rule the courts will not interfere with the action of an association in suspending or expelling a member, although they may do so where such action was illegal and particularly where property rights are involved. Ordinarily, a suspended or expelled member should exhaust his remedies within the association before appealing to the courts for relief.

A proceeding by an association for the suspension or expulsion of a member is quasi judicial in character,[28] the decision of an association tribunal is ordinarily conclusive,[29] and the courts will not interfere to prevent a suspension or expulsion,[30] except to ascertain whether or not the society is proceeding in good faith,[31] and in accordance with its laws[32] and the law of the land,[33] in order to permit the granting of relief to an accused member against his illegal expulsion or suspension.[34]

"The law governing disputes arising in voluntary associations is simple and well settled. It proceeds upon the theory that the members are, in a sense, one family, and entitled to settle their family jars without outside interference, and in their own way Thus it is held that, where proceedings for the expulsion of a member of such an association have been conducted in accordance with its laws, the courts will in the first instance assume that the acts charged constituted cause for removal within the meaning of those laws. Such associations are not, however, above the law of the land, nor altogether a law unto themselves. Their very nature and frequent manner of operation require and find a jealous supervision, in order to prevent irreparable wrong done to members under the guise of family chastisement. It is not the policy of the law that our people shall be left to suffer without redress from the whims or at the caprice of those to whom they have in good faith temporarily intrusted themselves and their affairs Therefore the law is vigilant to prevent a violation of the constitution and by-laws of the association involved, and to see to it that suspension or expulsion is only had after fair notice to the offending member and full opportunity to be heard in his own behalf"—Bricklayers', Plasterers' & Stonemasons' Union v. Bowen, supra.

Resort to equity justified
(1) Where a member of a voluntary association has been convicted of an offense and expelled in violation of the rules and by-laws of the association, and where no by-laws or other laws of the association make any adequate allowance for relief by appeal from such conviction and expulsion, such member may resort to equity for relief—Willis v. Davis, (Tex Civ.App.) 233 S W. 1035.

(2) A member of a voluntary association who was acquitted by his local lodge of making an attack on grand officers, but who on appeal to the grand officers themselves was found guilty and ordered to be expelled, was entitled to restrain the association from expelling him, the provision of the by-laws providing for an appeal to, and another trial before, the grand officers, without the right on the part of the accused member to appeal from the judgment of such grand officers, being unreasonable and inadequate in such case.—Willis v. Davis, supra.

As a rule the courts will not interfere unless the suspension or expulsion will result in an invasion of the member's civil, pecuniary, or property rights.[35] Such rights the courts will protect;[36] but to entitle a member to protection he must have a severable interest in the property of the association; a property right which is merely incidental to his membership and which ceases with it is not sufficient.[37]

Where an association under its rules suspends or expels a member, such member must ordinarily resort to and exhaust the remedies provided by the association under its constitution and by-laws before applying to the courts for relief,[38] although where an associate tribunal suspends or expels a member without jurisdiction to act in the premises,[39] or where an appeal within the organization would obviously be futile, as where the appellate board is clearly not impartial in character,[40] the expelled member need not appeal within the order

Injunction granted

Where members of a lodge of Free and Accepted Masons had no notice that charges would be preferred against them, and no opportunity was accorded them to appear and defend the charges, the association will be enjoined from suspending them, it not appearing that any appeal from the action of the association in defending them was provided by the constitution and by-laws of the association, or any further remedy or remedies furnished by it for the alleged wrong—Evans v. Pecuniary rights protected

Where, under the agreement of an association, a member is entitled to pecuniary benefits under certain circumstances, equity will prevent deprivation thereof except by proceedings conducted in accordance with the rules of the society, and for that purpose will inquire into such proceedings only to determine whether or not the association is acting within its jurisdiction—Rogers v. Tangier Temple, A A O N M. S, 198 N.W. 873, 112 Neb. 166.

A member has no such severable right in the funds of a voluntary unincorporated association, accruing from initiation fees, dues, and assessments, as will authorize a court of equity to interfere to prevent his wrongful suspension or expulsion from the association, his remedy, if any, being at law—Rogers v. Although property rights may be jeopardized by the delay, a member of an association must as a rule exhaust his remedies within the association before appealing to the courts—Andrews v Local Union No 13, Journeymen Plumbers, Gas and Steamfitters, and Sprinkler Fitters, of Rochester, N Y., 234 N.Y.S. 208, 133 Misc. 899.

Right of appeal

(1) The by-law of a lodge giving a right of appeal on "questions arising in lodges" is broad enough to include appeals from the suspension of a member, it not being limited to controversies between members or parties within the lodge, especially in view of the fact that there is no provision making the suspension of the member final—Gardner v. East Rock Lodge, No 141, I. B. P. O E of W, 113 A 308, 96 Conn. 198.

(2) Even though the provisions in a by-law for appeal from decisions of the lodges is permissive only, a member of the lodge must exhaust his right to appeal from his suspension from the lodge as a disciplinary measure which did not involve any property rights, before he can resort to the courts for redress.—Gardner v. East Rock Lodge, No. 141, I. B P. O E of W., supra.

(3) Failure of appellate tribunal in association to act on appeal from expulsion after action was commenced was not equivalent to refusal to act, so as to justify resort to courts—Holt v. White, 224 N.Y.S 507, 221 App Div. 558, affirmed 162 N.E. 546, 248 N.Y. 613.

Rule applicable where injunction sought against less than total membership

The rule that the aggrieved person must first exhaust his recourse within the society is applicable to an injunction against the majority of the members to restrain them from voting on the expulsion of a member, as well as where an injunction is sought against the association itself, or all of its members—Irwin v. Lorio, 126 So 669, 169 La. 1090

"The rule requiring that a member must exhaust his remedies within the organization before applying to a court of equity for relief is subject to the qualification that the suspension must have followed a legal and regular proceeding within the organization. Where the proceeding is irregular, the association acquires no jurisdiction to make the order and the person aggrieved thereby may seek redress by a direct appeal to the courts."—Rodier v. Huddell, supra.

Void suspension

(1) An order, suspending a member of the lodge until he paid a stated sum, which was beyond the jurisdiction of the lodge under the by-laws, is void, and the member is not required to exhaust his remedies by appeal within the lodge before resorting to the courts for redress against such suspension—Gardner v. East Rock Lodge, No 141, I. B P. O. E of W., 113 A. 308, 96 Conn 198

(2) Where the by-laws of a lodge fixed the penalties to be imposed by the lodge as reprimand, suspension for a definite time, expulsion, or a fine, a resolution of the lodge, suspending three members until they paid a stated sum which the lodge found to be owing by them to the lodge, was beyond the jurisdiction of the lodge, jurisdiction being the lawful power to hear and determine—Gardner v. East Rock Lodge, No 141, I. B P O. E of W, supra.

40. Rodier v. Huddell, 250 N.Y.S. 336, 232 App Div. 531.

but may resort directly to the courts. Where proceedings for expulsion have been fairly conducted in accordance with the rules of the association, the courts will, in the first instance, assume that the acts charged constituted sufficient ground for expulsion under the associate laws.[41]

f. Right to Damages for Wrongful Suspension or Expulsion

As a rule, damages may be recovered for an illegal suspension or expulsion of a member, although the right to damages has been denied in some cases.

A member who has been wrongfully suspended or expelled from an association may resort to an action against the society or its members for the damages resulting from its illegal act;[42] and this he may do even after he has been reinstated to membership by the society.[43] Some authorities, however, hold that such an action is not maintainable,[44] at least where the society, in suspending or expelling the member, acted in good faith and its error was one of judgment merely,[45] or where the member has submitted to the jurisdiction of the association by appealing from the judgment of the trial committee to the members as a body, who affirm the decision below.[46]

In determining whether or not an association and its members may be held liable to respond in damages for expulsion of a member, the court will consider the rights and duties of the members, subordinate bodies, and superior officers and tribunals of the association as defined by its rules and regulations,[47] and damages may be denied in the absence of proof of illegality or malice in the proceedings leading to expulsion,[48] even where the member was subsequently expelled after just being tried and acquitted of the same offense.[49]

In an action for damages for an alleged wrongful expulsion, plaintiff may not properly complain

47. Simpson v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 98 S.E. 580, 82 W.Va. 355, certiorari denied 39 S.Ct. 494.

"An inquiry as to the liability of an unincorporated association and members thereof, for alleged wrongful and illegal expulsion, participated in by a subordinate body acting under the orders of a superior officer constituting the official head of the association, involves consideration of the rights, duties, powers, and obligations of the members, the subordinate bodies and superior officers and tribunals, as determined by the constating articles of agreement, by-laws, rules and regulations, often designated as the constitution, statutes, and rules, and the usages and precedents of such organizations"—Simpson v. Grand International Brotherhood of locomotive engineers, supra.

(1) An inference of malice of members of a subordinate association, in voting to expel a member after voting his acquittal on charges preferred against him sufficient to sustain a verdict predicated on such theory, is not deducible from a mere change of attitude, especially where the superior officer has intervened and annulled the acquittal as being contrary to the weight of the evidence—Simpson v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 98 S.E. 580, 82 W.Va. 355, certiorari denied 39 S.Ct. 494.

(2) The presence at the expulsion of accused of a member of a subordinate lodge of an association, between whom and accused there had been a previous animosity, and who encouraged a superior officer to rescind the alleged unjustifiable acquittal, but who was excused on his own motion from voting on the expulsion, did not raise the inference of malice which would sustain a finding thereon—Simpson v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, supra.

49. Simpson v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, supra.

Exercise of appellate power after acquittal

(1) Official head of an unincorporated association, a brotherhood of locomotive engineers, by its constitution given full control over the order in general, subject to review by a triennial convention of the order, may exercise appellate power, after the acquittal of a member tried for breach of a rule justifying expulsion if guilty, and the court, in the member's action for damages for illegal expulsion, cannot deny such authority in the absence of denial by the association's tribunal of last resort—Simpson v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 98 S.E. 580, 82 W.Va. 355, certiorari denied 39 S.Ct. 494.

(2) It cannot be judicially determined by civil court that the official head of an association, such as a brotherhood of locomotive engineers, empowered to suspend the charter of a subordinate lodge in which the trial for a member's expulsion occurred, may not exercise appellate power so as to compel the expulsion or loss of charter, where the evidence on the trial afforded the basis for two honest opinions as to the innocence of accused member—Simpson v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, supra.

Legal presumption against right to enforce second trial rebutted

Any legal presumption against the right in tribunals of an unincorporated association to subject a member thereof to a second trial for the same offense is excluded by the terms of its constitution, making the enactments and decisions of its highest tribunal its supreme law.—Simpson v. Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 98 S.E. 580, 82 W.Va. 355, certiorari denied 39 S.Ct. 494.

of formal defects in the proceedings before the associate tribunal, where he raised no such objections before the associate tribunal,[50] nor can he recover damages where his expulsion was valid and binding under the rules of the association,[51] and the members of an executive committee of a local organization are not responsible for failure of the state organization to act directly in respect of an appeal from the order of expulsion.[52] Mere membership in a voluntary association does not make all the members liable for acts of their associates, such as wrongful expulsion of a member, done without their knowledge or approval, and liability is not to be inferred from mere membership.[53]

Where applicable statutory provisions permit recovery of damages for wrongful expulsion only when all the members are liable, a wrongfully expelled member cannot after reinstatement recover damages in the absence of allegations and proof showing liability of all members.[54]

The damages to be recovered by a member wrongfully suspended or expelled from an unincorporated society may include the loss sustained by being deprived of the use and enjoyment of the property of the society and of the privileges of membership,[55] loss of wages resulting from his inability to obtain employment by reason of his suspension,[56] and also the mental suffering caused by the wrongful expulsion and the manner in which it was effected.[57]

Where an association suspends a member without authority, and prevents him from securing any work in the city where he resides, he is under no obligation to it to accept employment outside of the city.[58]

§ 26. —— Reinstatement

a. Under laws of association
b. Judicial interference to compel reinstatement

a. Under Laws of Association

Where a member of an association has been lawfully expelled, he is entitled to reinstatement only on compliance with applicable conditions imposed by the association.

If the suspension of a member is not illegal, the association may lawfully refuse to reinstate him,[59] or it may impose such conditions on his reinstatement and prescribe such formalities therefor as it may see fit.[60] If the member complies with the laws of the society in this respect, he is restored to membership;[61] otherwise he is not.[62]

b. Judicial Interference to Compel Reinstatement

(1) By courts of law
(2) By courts of equitable cognizance

(1) By Courts of Law

Generally speaking, a suspended or expelled member may not secure reinstatement through courts of common law.

Ordinarily, no remedy exists in the common-law courts whereby a member who has been suspended or expelled may be restored to membership in the association.[63]

(2) By Courts of Equitable Cognizance
- (a) In general
- (b) Necessity of exhausting remedies within association
- (c) Necessity of doing equity

(a) In General

In a proper case a court of equitable cognizance may interfere to compel the reinstatement of an expelled or suspended member of an association.

In the matter of the suspension or expulsion of a member, the association acts in a quasi judicial capacity, and where the society, fairly and in good faith, acts within its powers, and in accordance with its laws and the law of the land, its decision, like that of a judicial tribunal, is conclusive as against a collateral attack; and, accordingly, a court of equity will not interfere under such circumstances, at the suit of a member who has been suspended or expelled, to compel the association to reinstate him to membership.[64] Some courts have gone so far as to hold that, although a by-law is such that the courts would not enforce it, yet if a member is suspended thereunder equity will not reinstate him, since his right to membership is founded on his contract with the association, which, if accepted by the member, must be accepted in toto,[65] and that, if it is agreed that no one shall remain a member who refuses to comply with the association's rules, a member who has been suspended for noncompliance therewith will not be reinstated, even though his default consisted in the breach of an illegal agreement with a third person.[66]

On the other hand, a court of equity will reinstate a member, where the association, in suspending or expelling him, acted unfairly or in bad faith, or beyond its powers, and not in accordance with its laws or the law of the land, such relief being granted by way of a decree annulling the wrongful suspension or expulsion, adjudging the member to be entitled to the rights and privileges of membership, and directing his restoration or reinstatement, or enjoining the association from depriving him of such rights and privileges or interfering therewith.[67] Accordingly, the court may inquire into the power and jurisdiction of the association to suspend or expel the member,[68] the reasonableness and propriety of the suspension or expulsion[69] and the grounds thereof,[70] and the regularity of the proceedings,[71] but the court will not pass on the merits of the suspension or expulsion,[72] nor will a member be reinstated on account of irregularities which he has waived,[73] and it has been held also that the power of the courts to interfere is limited to cases in which the association possesses real or personal property, or is engaged in some pecuniary enterprise in which the members have an interest, whereby their property rights are necessarily involved.[74]

Although a member has forfeited his membership by his own act or neglect, yet, where he performs the acts required to be performed by the laws of the association as a condition of reinstatement, a court of equity has power to restore him to membership in case the society refuses to do so.[75]

The fact that a member was guilty of the acts for which he was expelled will not necessarily prevent his reinstatement, where he had once been tried and acquitted by an associate tribunal.[76]

Right of expulsion dependent on "conviction"

"Where a member has been once tried and acquitted of charges preferred against him in a voluntary association, and the right to expel him from such association exists only upon conviction, the fact that he was in fact guilty of violating a rule of the association is no defense

(b) Necessity of Exhausting Remedies within Association

Ordinarily, a suspended or expelled member should exhaust his remedies within the association before applying to the courts for reinstatement, although this rule does not apply where suspension or expulsion was made without jurisdiction, nor where resort to a tribunal of the association would necessarily be ineffectual.

Before applying to a court of equity for reinstatement, a disfranchised member must, as a rule, exhaust all remedies available to him under the laws of the association,[77] and the courts will not interfere in the absence of action arbitrary in character or taken in violation of rules of the association.[78] However, this rule does not apply, it has been held, where the association, in suspending or expelling the member, acted entirely without jurisdiction,[79] nor where the remedy provided by the laws of the society is not available to the member,[80] nor where there is an extremely remote possibility of its proving effective,[81] and the rule is, of course, inapplicable where no remedy is afforded by the laws of the association.[82]

(c) Necessity of Doing Equity

A member expelled for nonpayment of dues should tender the unpaid dues before applying to a court of equity for reinstatement.

In accordance with the familiar maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity, where a member of a voluntary association is expelled for nonpayment of dues, he cannot compel reinstatement until he has tendered the dues or made an unsuccessful application to learn their amount.[83]

§ 27. —— Interest in Association Property

a. In general
b. On termination of membership
c. Socialistic communities
d. Right of subordinate branch or supreme body

a. In General

Ordinarily, the property of an association belongs to the members jointly, although where rules of the association so provide the members may have severable and transferable interests in the property.

Since a voluntary association ordinarily has no separate entity, as has been explained in § 1 supra, and, therefore, cannot, as such, acquire or hold property, as shown in § 14 supra, the ownership of any property or funds acquired or held by it is vested in the members jointly,[84] and they, accordingly, have the right to manage, control, and dispose of such property or funds at their joint pleasure.[85]

By becoming a member of an association a person ordinarily acquires, not a severable right to any of its property or funds, but merely a right to the joint use and enjoyment thereof so long as he continues to be a member.[86] Accordingly, the rights of an individual member are not transmissible by assignment on his part during his lifetime,[87] and on his death do not pass to his heirs or next of kin,[88] or to his devisees or legatees,[89] unless the association has been previously dissolved, as has been explained in § 10 supra. So long as he remains a member of the association, however, he has an absolute right, which the courts will protect, to have its property and funds controlled and administered according to its organic plan, and to participate in its affairs in harmony therewith.[90]

Associations may, however, by the adoption of a constitution or other general rules, determine final-to an action by him to secure his reinstatement, where he was subsequently retried and found guilty; such second trial being without jurisdiction"—Rueb v Rehder, 174 P. 992, 24 N.M. 534, 1 A.L.R. 423

ly the property rights and interest of a member, or of a subordinate branch or lodge, in and to the funds and property of the association,[91] and where the rules and regulations of an association provide for severable and transferable individual interests of members, the member may transfer such interest in accordance with the regulations of the association.[92]

A member of an association owning an oil lease, who is not an officer or trustee of the association, may, it has been held, sell his own interest in the property, as he sees fit, without accounting to the other members[93]

b. On Termination of Membership

On termination of membership the right of members to property of the association ordinarily ceases, and those who remain have the sole right to such property Suspension of a member terminates his interest in the property of the association unless and until he again acquires membership

In the absence of provisions in the constitution or by-laws giving members an individual interest in the assets of a voluntary association, members who withdraw thereby lose their rights to associate property, title to which stays in the members remaining in the association,[94] and the rule applies whether membership is terminated by the member's own act or omission[95] or by the act of the society[96] This rule applies even where a number of members secede in a body,[97] and although they constitute a majority,[98] and organize a new association[99] In such case the remaining members, and only they, are entitled to the entire funds and property of the association, so long as they continue to keep it alive and adhere to its purposes.[1]

Under a by-law providing that no member of an automobile association shall be entitled to refund of money advanced by him for space at an automobile show unless he was a member at, or prior to, the last annual meeting held prior to such show, one not a member at such time is not entitled to such refund[2]

Members of an association seeking to exclude certain other members from all rights in its property on the ground of their alleged withdrawal have the burden of proving the withdrawal.[3]

A petition by an association alleging that defendants have withdrawn from the society but are wrongfully keeping its property need not contain a formal allegation of demand.[4]

Effect of suspension. While the suspension of a member does not terminate his membership in the association, it does deprive him of the rights and privileges of membership until he is reinstated in accordance with the laws of the society;[5] and accordingly, while a suspended member may have a contingent interest in the funds and property of the association,[6] he has no legal interest therein.[7]

c. Socialistic Communities

One whose membership in a socialistic community has been legally terminated loses all right to the property owned in common, where the rules of the community so provide, although an illegally expelled member may retain his property rights irrespective of associate rules to the contrary.

The rules announced in the two preceding subsections apply to the interest of members in the common property of a socialistic community. The contract by which a member of such a community renounces his right to private ownership in any property which he may have contributed to the common fund, or in the product of his own labor, is valid and binding,[8] and a member who voluntarily withdraws or who is legally expelled,[9] or the heirs and personal representatives of a deceased member,[10] have no right to any part of such property.

It has been held, however, that such an agreement will not invalidate a demand for a proportionate share of the common property made by one who had been illegally expelled.[11]

Hawaiian land hui. It has been held that while members of an Hawaiian land hui hold the property as tenants in common, shareholders in the land take their interests subject to such valid regulations as may have been adopted by the hui with reference to holding the land in severalty.[12]

d. Right of Subordinate Branch or Supreme Body

The right of a subordinate branch, lodge, or local to association funds or property, as between it and the supreme body of an association, will ordinarily terminate on formal or actual withdrawal of the local from the main body.

The supreme body of an association, divided into local branches or lodges, may enforce its laws, properly enacted, requiring the subordinate lodge, on voluntary dissolution, to surrender its property and funds to the supreme body,[13] and where a local has in effect ceased to be a member of the main body, it may lose its rights to funds subscribed for it as such local;[14] although where the supreme body has, pursuant to the laws of the association, revoked the charter of the subordinate lodge, the supreme body may be denied the power to require the subordinate body or local to surrender its funds or property to the supreme body,[15] unless the local whose charter was revoked has acquiesced in such revocation and become defunct, in which case the property and funds of the local may be awarded to the supreme body under applicable association regulations rather than to the former members of the then defunct local.[16]

§ 28. —— Power to Bind Association

a. Individual members
b. Majority

a. Individual Members

As a general rule an individual member lacks power to bind the association.

In the absence of authority specially conferred, a single member has no power to bind the association,[17] and this is especially true where the society

Hui regarded as voluntary association has intrusted the management of its affairs to chosen officers.[18] So one member cannot, by his unauthorized acts, impose on another member a liability for tort.[19]

b. Majority

Broadly speaking a majority of the members of an association has power to control its action as to all matters expressly or impliedly within the scope of its objects; but members who neither authorize nor ratify an act of part of the membership are not bound thereby unless such act was clearly in furtherance of associate objects.

In the absence of anything to the contrary in the laws or usages of the association,[20] the majority of the members possess authority to control its action as to all matters within the scope of the objects for which it was formed,[21] whether such objects are mentioned in the articles of association or are necessarily implied therefrom;[22] and this includes the power of control over the funds of the association.[23] However, the members of an association are not bound by an act of a part of the members which they did not authorize and have not ratified, unless the act is clearly in furtherance of the objects for which the society was organized.[24]

§ 29. —— Duties and Liabilities to Association in General

An association should, ordinarily, seek redress against a member violating its rules by appropriate remedies under its own regulations. A member may be held liable on his bond for breach of a regulation of the association. A duly retiring member is not, ordinarily, responsible for association debts as between himself and other members.

The duties and liabilities of members to the association as respects fraud and breach of trust will be considered in § 30, and the matter of dues, assessments, fines, and penalties will be taken up in § 31. An association has been denied the right to enjoin a member from violating a contract between the association and a third person, to which defendant member was not a party, the court stating that the association's remedy against such member was a fine, suspension, or expulsion under applicable regulations of the association.[25]

Breach of obligation of bond. A member of an association, and his surety, may be held liable on the member's bond for breach of a valid regulation of the association covered by such bond.[26]

Liability of retiring member for debts. Where the by-laws of an association authorize the withdrawal of members on a certain notice without any reservation of liability for outstanding debts of the society, a retiring member is not, as between himself and the remaining members, liable for the association's debts.[27]

§ 30. —— Fraud or Breach of Trust

A member may be held liable to the association for his fraud or breach of trust.

A member of an association is liable for a fraud perpetrated on his associates in dealing with the common property.[28] So, until the relation of membership in the association has been terminated by some unequivocal act on their part, the members of an association are bound to act for the promotion of the common interest, and will not be allowed to deal secretly with respect to the common enterprise, either with or for the association, for their own benefit, and if they do so, all profits thereby made by them will inure to the benefit of the association, and they will be compelled to account therefor,[29] unless the association has waived the fraud.[30]

However, where no fraud nor breach of trust is shown, a member may properly make a personal

§ 31. —— Dues, Assessments, Fines and Penalties

Liability of members for dues, assessments, fines, and penalties imposed or levied by the association depends on the contract of association as embodied in the articles of association and by-laws Where the contract between the member and the association, as embodied in its regulations, does not impose a personal liability on members for dues, assessments, fines, and penalties, there can be no recovery thereof; although recovery may be permitted where such contract does impose a personal liability, provided the association acts lawfully in levying or imposing the sum claimed.

The liability of a member of an association for dues and assessments, and for fines and penalties, depends on his contract with the association as embodied in its articles of association or constitution and by-laws. If this contract does not impose a personal obligation on the member to pay, the association's only remedy, if any exists, lies wholly within the association, and it cannot collect the sum due by action against the member.[34] Frequently, however, the contract makes the member personally liable for dues and assessments, and fines and penalties, in which event they are recoverable by action,[35] provided the association, in levying and imposing the same, acts within its powers,[36] and according to its laws,[37] and the law of the land.[38] An arbitrary assessment by way of a fine may not be recovered.[39]

Proposed contract with plumbers' association never in effect

(1) Where one having a contract with the government to do plumbing work in a cantonment attempted to enter into an agreement with all the members of a master plumbers' association, whereby such members were to furnish the necessary men to do the work and were to share in the profits, and certain of the members were selected as a committee which was to formulate a contract, but no contract was formulated which was acceptable to both sides, the contractor had the right to terminate the negotiations entirely and to enter into an agreement with the members of the committee alone, without rendering himself liable to the other members of the association—Goff & Heger v Walker, 174 N.W 661, 187 Iowa 959.

(2) Where a company obtained a contract from the government to install plumbing in a cantonment and attempted to enter into an agreement with all the members of a master plumbers' association, the master plumbers to furnish men to do the work and to share in the profits, and certain members were selected by the association as an advisory committee to reduce the proposed contract between the association and the company to writing, and such committee attempted to formulate a contract which would be acceptable to both parties, but failed, any agency existing between the members of the association and the committee terminated when the company withdrew its proposition and terminated negotiations with the association, and the members of the committee could properly thereafter, without becoming liable to account to the members of the entire association, enter into an agreement with the company and share in the profits thereof, there being no bad faith or breach of duty by such members prior to the withdrawal of the proposition by the company—Goff & Heger v Walker, supra

39. American Men's & Boys' Clothing Mfrs' Ass'n v Proser, 179 N. Y S 207, 210, 190 App Div 164.

"It is quite competent for such an association as the plaintiff to fix penalties by way of fines for derelictions of its members, but the penalties must be determined according to some method, to which the member has agreed, at least impliedly by joining the association, not only as to the imposition of the fine, but also as to the maximum amount thereof, otherwise, the association would be allowed to assess its own damages, which would be clearly unjust and improper And a by-law imposing an excessive fine would be set aside as unreasonable."—American Men's & Boys' Clothing Mfrs.' Ass'n, v. Proser, supra

Fine held arbitrary

An association composed of clothing manufacturers, who in joining agreed to be subject, after a hearing, to a fine for any infraction of the rules and regulations of the association, was without legal authority to fix an arbitrary assessment by way of a fine against recalcitrant members, who had refused to lay off their cutters in forwarding the settlement of a strike, so that the association could not recover such fine, although a reasonable fine, fixed according to some predetermined method and in the nature of liquidated damages for injuries sustained, would be upheld. —American Men's & Boys' Clothing

An objection that the society has not exhausted all the remedies open to it under the laws of the association should be raised by answer, and not by demurrer.[40]

Commencement, duration, and termination of liability. A member is not liable for dues accruing and assessments levied before he joined the association,[41] or for dues accruing after the termination of his membership.[42] His liability continues as long as he remains a member of the association, although he may have ceased to participate in its operations;[43] he is liable for dues and assessments accruing and levied while he was a member, although his default in paying the same has worked a forfeiture of his membership,[44] and a member withdrawing from an association must pay his dues in accordance with applicable provisions of the by-laws.[45] Since the suspension of a member does not terminate his membership, he is liable for dues and assessments accruing during the period of his suspension.[46]

Where dues to an association are, by its constitution, made payable in advance, payment is not excused by the fact that the society becomes insolvent and goes into the hands of a receiver within the period for which the dues are demanded,[47] but a subscriber to the funds of an association not originally intended to be incorporated is absolved from his agreement to pay the sum subscribed by the incorporation of the association without his consent.[48]

Right of withdrawing branch to return of dues from main body. Where a branch of an association withdraws from the main body and becomes merged in a corporation, it loses the right to have returned to it the dues which have been paid by it to the treasurer of the association, and the corporation into which such branch is merged acquires no title to any part of the money held by the treasurer of the voluntary association.[49]

§ 32. —— Duties and Liabilities to Persons Not Members

a In general
b Liability on contract
c. Liability for torts

a. In General

Although liability for the acts of associates may not be predicated on membership alone, it may be established by a public act of the association or by acts of officers, agents, or members known to and approved by the member held liable.

While mere membership in an association does not of itself impose liability for the acts of the associates,[50] universal liability of members of a voluntary, unincorporated association may be established by a public act of the association itself, or by the acts of officers, agents, or members where such acts are known to the membership and actively or passively approved.[51]

b. Liability on Contract

(1) In general
(2) Proportion of liability
(3) Liability for debts incurred outside of period of membership
(4) Liability for debts beyond scope of association objects
(5) Effect of incorporation of association
(6) Particular classes of associations

(1) In General

Dues for "ensuing" quarter

Under sections of by-laws of an agricultural publishers' association providing for advance quarterly payment of assessments and withdrawal by written notice to the board of directors to become effective on payment of delinquent assessments and assessments for the ensuing quarter, a member withdrawing during a quarter was required to pay for that quarter as delinquent dues and for one quarter in advance thereof as the ensuing quarter, since "ensue" means "to follow after" or "follow in order or train of events," and, therefore, the "ensuing quarter" meant the quarter following that for which he had already paid.—Agricultural Publishers' Ass'n v. contracts made without authority or compliance with requisite formalities, although they may be held individually liable for contracts which they have authorized or ratified The member actually making the contract will be personally bound.

Where a member of an unincorporated association contracts in the name of such supposed principal, which has no legal existence and cannot sue or be sued, such member is himself personally bound [53] and, where it is not shown by a defendant sued on a contract made by him whether the organization for which he claims to have acted was a corporation or an association, the court will hold him personally liable on the contract.[53]

Aside from the effect of the character of the association on the liability of members, which will be taken up in subsection b (6), it may be stated broadly that the members of an unincorporated association cannot be held liable because some of its officers undertake to make all the members liable on a contract without any authority and without following the formalities necessary to bind the members,[54] but that, wherever the members of an association are personally chargeable with knowledge and authorization or ratification of an associate contract, they may be held individually liable thereon to third persons,[55] and that, under statutes providing for suit against associates in their common name, and that the judgment in such action shall bind the joint and individual property of the parties served with process, recovery may be had from the individual members of an association [56]

Addition of the words "no personal liability" to the signature of an association officer on a contract has been held insufficient of itself to relieve the members of the association from personal liability on the contract.[57]

Persons making voluntary donations to an association, without any participation in the organization or operation of the business of the association, and on the express understanding that they are not becoming members thereof, may not be held liable for obligations incurred by the association.[58]

Constitutional provisions to the effect that the term "corporation" shall include all associations and joint-stock companies having any of the powers or privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships apply only to associations incorporated under the general laws, and an association not so incorporated is not within the benefit of laws limiting the liability of individual members of a corporation or joint-stock association.[59]

(2) Proportion of Liability

Where liability is established, each member of an association is individually liable to its creditors for the entire debt.

While, as between the members of an unincorporated association, each is bound to pay only his numerical proportion of the indebtedness of the concern, as will be shown in section 33, yet, as against the creditors, each member is individually liable for the entire debt, provided, of course, the debt is of such a nature and has been so contracted as to be binding on the associates as a whole,[60] as will be more particularly considered in subsection (6) hereof.

(3) Liability for Debts Incurred Outside of Period of Membership

Ordinarily a member of an association may not be held responsible for debts incurred before or after the period of his membership.

Farmers' union store

Mere membership in a farmers' cooperative union would not impose liability for goods sold to a union store conducted by some of the members, since no one could bind the members of the organization as partners or parties to an enterprise or contract of such character of which they had no knowledge and to which they did not assent, although those engaging in the business, that is, becoming members of the association for the purpose of carrying on the store or reaping profit from its business, became thereby liable for its obligations.—Dinsmore v. S.C.—Medlin v. Ebenezer Methodist Church, 129 S.E. 830, 132 S.C. 498.
5 C.J. p. 1362 note 16.

To render a member liable for a debt of the association, it must have been contracted while he was a member of the society. He is not liable for a debt incurred before he became a member,[61] nor after his membership has ceased,[62] provided the creditor, at the time of extending credit, had notice of the cessation of membership.[63]

(4) Liability for Debts beyond Scope of Association Objects

In the absence of his assent or ratification, a member is not liable for a debt arising from a transaction beyond the scope and purpose of the association.

If a debt arises out of a transaction entirely without the scope of the objects and purposes of the association, a member is not liable therefor,[64] unless he, either expressly or by implication, assented to the transaction either before or at the time it was entered into, or subsequently ratified it, in either of which cases he is bound.[65]

(5) Effect of Incorporation of Association

The incorporation of an association may not relieve its members from liability for debts subsequently contracted by the association outside of the scope of its corporate powers, and an ineffectual incorporation of an association does not save the members from liability for debts subsequently contracted by the association, although persons not participating in the business of the association may be relieved from liability on the latter ground.

Since the incorporation of an existing association operates as a dissolution of the society, as has been shown in section 9, it follows that a member is not liable, by reason of his former membership, for debts subsequently contracted by the association; but the incorporation of an association does not relieve its members from individual liability for debts subsequently contracted by the association outside of the scope of its corporate powers,[66] and an irregular, and hence ineffectual, incorporation of a preexisting association does not save the members from liability for debts subsequently contracted by the association[67]

If, however, individuals intend to form a corporation, and the organization in fact operates as an unincorporated association, but it is shown that such individuals had no part in the operation of the business or the selection of agents, then they may not be held liable as partners in an association in whose activities they did not in fact participate.[68]

The fact that the payee accepted notes of an association under the mistaken belief that they were executed by a corporation of the name indicated does not estop him to assert liability against the individual members of an association operating under that name.[69]

(6) Particular Classes of Associations

(a) In general
(b) Commercial associations
(c) Noncommercial associations

(a) In General

For the purpose of determining the contractual liability of members, associations may be classified as profit or nonprofit, commercial or noncommercial.

Broadly speaking, there are two classes of associations, one organized for profit and the other organized without any hope or expectation of profit.[70] The only difference between such classes, as respects the liability of members, is that in the first, or commercial, type the members are in legal effect partners and individually liable for debts contracted in the name of the association by other members; whereas in associations of the second, or noncommercial, type the liability of the members is controlled by the law of agency, and to hold a member liable it must be shown that he actually or constructively assented to or ratified the contract on which the liability is predicated.[71]

Where the facts show that the members sued did so assent to or ratify the contract on which liability is predicated, it becomes unnecessary to determine whether the association is commercial or noncommercial in character, as under such a state of facts the members are liable in either event.[72]

(b) Commercial Associations

Members of a commercial association, or one organized for profit, may be held individually liable on association contracts as partners The liability of members is ordinarily joint and several in character.

It is elementary that several persons may conduct business as a voluntary association, using a common or trade name, and in that name be held jointly and severally liable on contracts.[73]

An unincorporated association organized for business or profit is in legal effect a mere partnership so far as the liability of its members to third persons is concerned, as has been explained in section 1. By becoming a member, each associate subjects himself to liability for all debts contracted by the association within the scope of its object and during the period of his membership[74]

The liability of the associates is joint and several,[75] and may be imposed, although the members of such an association did not agree to become partners,[76] nor hold themselves out as such,[77] nor intend to become personally bound,[78] nor hold themselves out as personally responsible,[79] and despite the fact that the creditor gave credit to the associate name.[80]

The fact that defendants did not expect to reap any personal profit from the enterprise in which they were engaged does not in any wise affect their liability as members of an association actually engaged in business.[81]

Liability on promissory note. Under a statute providing that no person is liable on a negotiable instrument whose signature does not appear thereon, except as otherwise provided, and other statutes to the effect that one may sign a negotiable instrument by an agent, members of a voluntary association for the conduct of a business may be held liable on a note which they did not personally sign, but which was signed by another associate as agent for all,[82] provided he had express or implied authority to do so, or in the absence of either, provided the nonsigning members subsequently ratified his act[83]

(c) Noncommercial Associations

The liability of members of a noncommercial association, or one organized for purposes other than profit, must be predicated on the laws of agency. Where liability exists, it may be joint or several, or joint and several.

An association not engaged in business enterprises and the objects of which do not contemplate profit or loss is not a partnership, as has been shown in section 1, and the liability of its members for debts contracted in behalf of the association is governed, not by the principles of partnership, but by those of agency.[84] Membership, as such, imposes no personal liability for the debts of the association; but to charge a member therewith it must be shown that he has actually or constructively assented to or ratified the contract on which the liability is predicated.[85] If, however, a member, as such, directly incurs a debt, or expressly or impliedly authorizes or ratifies the transaction in which it is incurred, he is liable as a principal.[86] So a member is liable for any debt that is necessarily contracted to carry out the objects of the association.[87]

In the event that members are liable, their liability may be joint,[88] or several,[89] or joint and several,[90] or partly joint and partly several,[91] depending on the circumstances, as on how goods were purchased from plaintiff or on defendant's refusal or ratification of purchases not directly made by themselves but by one of their number; but under a joint and several liability different defendants may not be held liable in different amounts.[92] It is a question for the jury to deter-

(3) A political association and individual members thereof are not liable on a contract made by a member in a representative capacity, in the absence of knowledge on the part of members that the contract had been executed with the intention of binding the members individually, or that individual members ratified or assented to liability thereon.—American Art Works v. Republican State Committee, supra.

Members not present at meeting at which contract of nonprofit association was made, and in no way personally participating in the execution of the contract, were rightly held not liable.—Murphy v. Holliway, 16 S.W.(2d) 107, 223 Mo.App. 714.

Association auxiliary to benevolent society as beyond protection of rule

An association auxiliary to a benevolent association, and formed for the express purpose of putting on a show to raise money for the benevolent society, is not within the rule governing nonprofit associations, and the members of such auxiliary may be held liable for debts contracted for advertising space on the theories of partnership law applicable to commercial associations.—Stege v. Acquiescence binding members to mortgage contract

Members of a voluntary, fraternal, and nonbusiness association will be bound, in a court of equity, by a mortgage of their trustees by long acquiescence with full knowledge of the fact.—Hope of Alabama Lodge of Odd Fellows v. Chambless, 103 So. 54, 212 Ala. 444.

Manner of becoming member unimportant

A member of an association participating in the execution of a contract is liable, regardless of the manner in which he became a member.—Murphy v. Holliway, 16 S.W.(2d) 107, 223 Mo.App. 714.

Failure to ascertain terms of contract

Members of an association permitting one member to order chairs in behalf of all, without ascertaining the terms of the instrument, did so at their peril.—Murphy v. Holliway, 16 S.W.(2d) 107, 223 Mo.App. 714.

Necessity for invoking statute

Members of a committee to promote the nomination of a candidate for governor, being jointly and severally liable, could be held in an action for the price of merchandise delivered them, but different defendants could not be held liable in different amounts, notwithstanding suit was on different contracts with separate individuals who assigned claims to plaintiff.—Fennell v. Hauser, 27 P.(2d) 685, 145 Or. 351.

mine whether credit was given to the members,[93] and whether the members authorized or ratified the contract in suit.[94]

c. Liability for Torts

While membership in an association does not per se impose liability on individual members for the torts of an association or its agents, the members may be held responsible for torts committed by the association within the scope of its purposes or for torts of association agents acting within the scope of their employment.

Although the mere fact of membership in an association is not of itself sufficient basis for a tort liability of individual members for the wrongful acts or omissions of an association or its agents,[95] the members are responsible for tortious acts committed by the society, where it can fairly be assumed that they were within the scope of the purposes for which the organization was formed,[96] or where they aided and abetted in the commission of the tort;[97] and they are liable for torts committed by the association's agents, acting within the scope of their employment.[98]

Where liability exists, the liability of the members has been held several for the whole amount of damages incurred by a third party and not limited to a numerical or aliquot part thereof.[99]

§ 33. —— Contribution between Members

As between members of an association each is ordinarily liable only for his aliquot share of association's indebtedness, and in a proper case may secure contribution from his comembers.

As between the members of an unincorporated association, each is bound to pay only his numerical proportion of its indebtedness,[1] and a member of an association who has been compelled to pay a debt may, when unable to obtain reimbursement from the association, enforce contribution in equity from the other members.[2]

§ 34. Judicial Interference

a. In general
b. Exhausting remedies within association

a. In General

In the absence of illegality or injustice ordinarily courts will not interfere in the internal affairs of an association, and the due decision of an association's tribunal as to such matters is controlling. Where, however, civil or property rights are involved, or where the action of the association is clearly illegal, judicial redress may be secured.

The courts will not interfere with the internal affairs of an unincorporated association so as to settle disputes between the members, or questions of policy, discipline, or internal government, so long as the government of the society is fairly and honestly administered in conformity with its laws and the law of the land, and no property or civil rights are invaded,[3] and, under such cir-

(2) To hold the members of an unincorporated association liable for a defamatory article published by their agent, it is not necessary to show authority, expressed or implied, to the agent to publish the libel; but there must be some evidence from which authority might be implied on the part of the agent to publish the article within the general scope of his employment—Pandolfo v. Compliance of local with rules of main body

The question of whether or not a local association has complied with the requirements of the constitution and by-laws of the principal association is primarily a matter of internal jurisdiction with which a court will not concern itself where no complaint has been made by the principal association against the local or branch body—Des Moines City Ry. (1) The operation of the constitution and by-laws of an unincorporated society, when applied as disciplinary measures, will not be interfered with by a court of equity, if they are applied justly and fairly—Grassi Bros. v. O'Rourke, 153 N Y S. 493, 89 Misc 234.

(2) Where an association is given power by its constitution to try members on charges preferred against them, courts will not restrain such trial where there is no showing of bad faith, malice, or manifest unfairness—Smith v. Merriott, 100 A. 731, 130 Md 447

Expunging vote of censure from records

Assuming that the constitution of a department of the American Legion constituted a contract between the members, a provision thereof authorizing the executive committee to suspend or remove officers or expel members did not limit its common-law right to make inquiry into, and report on, the conduct of its members, and, as its adoption and publication of a report censuring a post commander violated no contract or trust, equity has no jurisdiction by injunction to compel it to recall and expunge such report from its record—Choate v. Logan, (Mass) 133 N E. 582.

Restoration of charter of subordinate lodge

Recourse may not be had to civil courts for relief, as by mandamus or injunction, to have the officers of a grand lodge restore to a subordinate lodge its charter and rituals, where the by-laws and constitution of the order provided for an appeal from the order complained of to some higher branch which is vested with authority to determine the controversy—Brazelton v Slatten, (Tex Civ App) 255 S W. 1009.

ed,[8] or the proceedings in question are violative of the laws of the society[9] or the law of the land,[10] or ultra vires,[11] or are otherwise illegal.[12]

In this connection it has been pointed out that the rule that the courts will not interfere with the internal affairs of a voluntary association does not relieve such association from application of the general law of contracts,[13] and, while the courts will not overrule the decision of an association's tribunal merely because of a difference of opinion as to the merits, they will review the action taken sufficiently to ascertain whether such tribunal followed the procedural terms of the agreement and correctly construed and applied the substantive terms thereof.[14]

b. Exhausting Remedies within Association

A member should generally exhaust his remedies within the association before applying for judicial relief, although he may properly resort to the courts in the first instance where the action of the association has been irregular and without jurisdiction or where the procedure for relief within the association is obviously inadequate.

Even in cases otherwise warranting judicial interference the courts will not, as a rule, take jurisdiction unless the complaining member has exhausted such remedies as may be provided by the laws of the association itself.[15] However, the rule requiring a member to exhaust his remedies within the organization before applying to a court of equity for relief is subject to the qualification that the act or acts complained of must have been in accord with the association's regulations, and, where the proceeding is irregular and the association acted without jurisdiction, the member aggrieved thereby may seek judicial redress by a direct appeal to the courts in the first instance;[16] and immediate resort to the courts is warranted where the procedure for relief provided under association rules is obviously inadequate.[17]

The general rule is that in the absence of statutory authorization an unincorporated association may not sue as such, but must bring the action in the names of its individual members.

Since an unincorporated association has no legal entity distinct from that of its members, as explained in § 1, and is not a "person" in the eyes of the law,[18] it cannot in the absence of an enabling act maintain an action in its own name,[19] but must sue in the names of all the members composing it,[20] however numerous they may be,[21] or in the names of a portion for the benefit of all,[22] as in the case of parties by representation (infra subdivision a (3) of this section).

The rule forbidding an unincorporated association to sue as such in the absence of statutory authorization applies in both law and equity,[23] except that under equity rules a few may always represent all where the members are too numerous to be joined.[24]

If otherwise capable to sue, an association must have a legal right arising from a legal interest, denial of which inflicts or threatens a legal wrong, in order to be able to maintain an action.[25]

Waiver. The objection that an unincorporated association may not sue in its own name has been held subject to waiver,[26] although on principle, according to the doctrine of a number of cases, defendant's right to object in such a case is not waived by his failure to demur specially or to plead in abatement, but can be taken at any stage.[27]

(b) Agent Appointed to Sue

The right of an association to bring suit by agents appointed for such purpose has been both affirmed and denied.

While an unincorporated association cannot sue directly, yet it has been held that it may bring a suit through an agent specially appointed for that purpose,[28] or impliedly so authorized under the by-laws,[29] or file a bill in equity,[30] although its right to do so has also been denied.[31]

(c) Owner of Res or Obligee in Contract

An associate officer in whose name legal title to an obligation is vested for the benefit of the association may sue in his own name to enforce it.

If the legal title to an obligation is vested in an officer of the association for its benefit, he may sue in his own name to enforce it.[32] Indeed, if a contract is made with a member of an association in his own name, he alone can sue thereon,[33] and where the legal estate in property of an association is vested in trustees whose duty it is not only to hold the title but also to take charge of the property, a suit to protect the property rights of the association should be brought in the name of the trustees.[34]

(d) Collective Members

Members of an association have the right to sue, as individuals having a common interest, in respect of matters affecting such interest, although such suit should be brought in the name of all and not of one alone.

Of course, as has been intimated, the members of an unincorporated association are entitled as individuals having a common interest to sue in regard to matters affecting their interests.[35] However, such an action should be brought in the names of all the members composing it; and not by one member in his own name.[36]

(2) Under Enabling Acts

(a) Actions in names of officers or agents

(b) Actions in name of association

(c) Actions in name of trustee of express trust

(a) Actions in Names of Officers or Agents

Under statutes expressly providing that designated officers of an association may sue in its behalf, the action may be brought by the officer in his own name as such officer whenever the members could sue, although not otherwise. An agent appointed to make contracts for an association may sue thereon under statutes providing generally that one person may sue for all where the matter is of common interest.

Under statutes in some jurisdictions it is expressly provided that actions may be brought by an unincorporated association in the names of designated officers. The purpose of such statutes is to obviate the inconvenience of suing in the names of all the members,[37] and under such statutes the designated officer, as plaintiff, may maintain the action if the members could,[38] although such statutes confer upon the officer specified no right to sue except in cases where the associates could previously have prosecuted, the legislative intent being merely to obviate the inconvenience of joining all the associates as parties and to facilitate rights of action as they previously existed.[39]

Under statutes permitting one to sue for the benefit of all, where the matter is of common interest to many persons, an agent appointed to make contracts for an association may sue thereon in behalf of the associates.[40]

(b) Actions in Name of Association

An association may bring suit in its associate name where empowered to do so by statute, although statutes authorizing suit against an association as such do not authorize a suit in its behalf.

Where, under statutes, an association is recognized as a legal entity it may be accorded the implicit right to sue in its associate name.[41]

In some states are to be found statutes which, while they vary in their terms, are to the general effect that, where several persons form a voluntary unincorporated association, known by some distinguishing name, such association may sue by such common or distinguishing name.[42] Such statutes should receive the liberal construction ordinarily accorded statutes of a remedial character,[43] although they are intended merely to furnish a convenient method of conducting suits and should not be extended by judicial construction to change the legal status of an association nor to alter the substantive law of contracts as affecting unincorporated associations,[44] nor to permit suit in the associate name to redress the purely several wrongs of individual members[45]

Such a statute does not apply to an association formed for an illegal purpose.[46]

The procedure prescribed by the statute must be strictly followed[47]

Statutes restricted to business associations. Some statutes of this description specifically grant the right to sue in the association name to unincorporated associations which are organized for business purposes,[48] and under statutes of the latter description an unincorporated association which is not organized to carry on some trade or business in the state or to hold property therein, and does not in fact carry on a trade or business in the state or hold property therein, cannot sue in the associate name,[49] nor may a suit be maintained in the associate name where no property right of the association nor business interest thereof is involved[50]

Statutes permitting suit to be brought against an association in its common or associate name, which will be further considered in § 36, have been construed as not authorizing a suit to be brought by an association in such name.[51]

Amendment permitting suit as confined to actions at law

Pract Act provision authorizing unincorporated organizations to be sued, amended to allow them to sue

(c) Actions in Name of Trustee of Express Trust

Under statutory authority in some jurisdictions a suit may be brought for an unincorporated association in the names of its trustees.

The provision common to most of the codes authorizing a suit in his own name by the trustee of an express trust applies to a trustee for the benefit of an unincorporated association,[52] and under appropriate statutory provisions a suit in behalf of an association may or must be brought in the names of its trustees, if any.[53] Accordingly an action may be maintained in his own name by any associate officer in whom the title to property is vested for its benefit,[54] or upon whom is imposed the duty of enforcing for its benefit such obligations as may become due to the association.[55]

(3) Parties by Representation

As a general rule, some members of an unincorporated association may bring a suit as representatives of all, where there is a common interest in the subject matter of the suit, or where the number of members makes it impracticable to join all as parties plaintiff.

The strict common-law rule, referred to supra in subdivision a (1) (a), has been modified under the influence of equity practice,[56] and irrespective of statute, it is generally held that an action may be brought by one or more of the members of an unincorporated association for the benefit of all, where the members have a common or general interest in the subject matter of the suit, or where the members are numerous and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court,[57] since those who sue may fairly be presumed to represent the rights and interests of the whole.[58]

In such case it is not material that some of the named plaintiffs have died or ceased to be members, or are minors or married women; they may be disregarded as unnecessary parties.[59]

However, it has been held that, in order that a suit may be brought in this form, it must appear that the members of the association have such a common interest that, were they all before the court, they would be entitled to bring the action in their individual names,[60] and an action by a part of the members cannot be maintained unless it is filed in behalf of all or the others are made parties defendant.[61]

b. Venue

An action brought in behalf of an association by an officer thereof may, it has been held, be brought in the county of the officer's residence.

The officer suing in behalf of the association is the "party" within a statute requiring an action to be brought in the county or district in which one of the parties resides[62]

(a) Setting Out Names of Members

A declaration or complaint in behalf of an association should set forth the names of all the members unless facts are averred bringing the case within exceptions to such rule, as in the case of a representative suit or suit under statute.

The declaration in an action at common law by an unincorporated association should set out the names of all the individuals who are members of such association,[63] and this also seems to be necessary in a bill in equity by such associations,[64] except where the suit is brought by a part of the members on behalf of the association.[65]

However, a petition is sufficient which describes the society in the name of which suit is brought as a voluntary association composed of certain named persons as plaintiffs,[66] or which shows that the action is brought by an association of individuals as an entirety, the character of which is fully described, but in their own names.[67] Also, where a voluntary association appears in the bill as complainant, but the bill is signed and specifically consented to by an indorsement thereon by all the individual members of the association, such members are deemed thereby to have become parties complainant.[68]

Actions under statute. Where, unincorporated associations are expressly authorized by statute to sue in the usual name by which the association is known, it is unnecessary to set forth in the process or pleading, or to prove at the trial, the names of the persons composing such company or association.[69] Likewise, in an action by an unincorporated association under a statute authorizing such associations consisting of seven or more persons to sue in the name of a certain officer or officers, the complaint need not state the names of seven of the associates; it is sufficient if it avers that the association consists of seven members or upward.[70]

(b) Averment of Facts Authorizing Suit by Some Members in Behalf of All

A bill, petition, or complaint brought by some members in behalf of all should aver facts justifying such procedure, and the fact that they are suing in behalf of all.

Where a part of the members of an unincorporated association sue in behalf of all, the bill, petition, or complaint should set forth the facts justifying such course,[71] and the fact that plaintiff or plaintiffs are suing in behalf of all must be averred.[72]

As regards form, in cases of unincorporated associations the membership of which is large, suits may be brought either in the names of certain of the members "in behalf of themselves and all others interested" in the association, naming it, or in the name of the association by certain of its members, naming them; the former is the usual form, and is preferable by reason of its established use.[73]

Where, however, an officer of an association brings suit in its behalf, he need not allege that the parties in interest are too numerous to be all brought in, but it is sufficient if he alleges that the suit is brought for the benefit of all.[74] So a bill filed by the members of a voluntary association is not defective because it does not allege that plaintiffs were officers of their society or represented their associates, where it contains proper allegations as to why all the members of the society are not joined.[75] A declaration under a statute authorizing actions by the trustees of an association which shows in substance that the action is brought in the names of the trustees is sufficient, although inartificially drawn.[76]

(c) Averments Bringing Case within Statute

The plaintiff's initial pleading should contain allegations bringing the case within the purview of any applicable statutory provisions.

In actions under statutes changing the common-law rule as to actions by unincorporated associations and authorizing suits by such associations in the company name by or in the name of certain officers of the association, the petition or complaint should contain averments bringing the case within the statute.[77]

(2) Answer

Plaintiff's capacity to sue may be put in issue by a denial in the answer of the existence of the association.

In an action by one as the officer of an unincorporated association, under a statute authorizing suits in the name of certain officers of such an association when the latter consists of seven or more members, defendant, although he may not question at the trial the capacity of plaintiff to sue, may, by a denial in his answer of the existence of the association, put such fact in issue.[78]

(3) Amendment

After suit has been brought in the name of an association, incompetent to sue, there may be an amendment substituting certain members as parties plaintiff. But a writ issued in the name of an unincorporated association may not be amended to substitute the name of a corporation. An amendment may be allowed to show that plaintiffs are suing in a representative capacity as associate officials and not as individuals.

Where suit is brought in the name of the association itself, which is incompetent to sue, it is proper to allow an amendment substituting as plaintiffs certain of its members.[79]

But if a writ is issued in the name of an unincorporated association, it cannot be amended by inserting the name of a corporation as plaintiff, where the association had become incorporated before the issuance of the writ.[80]

In trespass quare clausum, plaintiffs may amend their writ, which charges defendant for an injury to their own property, by setting forth that they sue as deacons and overseers of a society of Shakers.[81]

d. Evidence

General rules of evidence control in actions brought by or on behalf of an association.

The general rules governing evidence apply in actions by or on behalf of an association.[82]

e. Dissolution of Association Pendente Lite

Reduction of the number of members of an association after the institution of suit to less than the number required as a quorum will not constitute a defense to an action by the trustees of the association for property placed in their custody.

The right of the trustees of an unincorporated association to maintain a suit for property placed in their custody must be determined by the status of the society at the time when the suit was brought; the fact that the number of members of the association is reduced after the institution of the suit to less than the number required as a quorum for the transaction of the business of the society will not constitute a defense to such an action.[83]

In a suit by a Masonic lodge to have a rival lodge restrained from doing business in the state, where the claims of both lodges rest upon the legality of defendant's organization, the charter of defendant was properly excluded, although had it been admitted it would show illegality of defendant's organization, and thus have put both parties out of court.—Most Worshipful King Solomon Grand Lodge A. an association where there are grounds of estoppel or waiver, or where the case is one demanding an extension of the equitable doctrine of representation of parties.

An unincorporated association cannot, in the absence of statute, be sued in its society or company name, but all the members must be made parties, since such bodies have, in the absence of statute, no legal entity distinct from that of their members.[84] As just intimated, the members may be sued collectively, provided there is a joint liability.[85]

Another mode of suit may be authorized by the articles of association, however.[86] Thus, an unincorporated society may provide for trustees in whom their property may be vested, and against whom all suits pertaining to the business of the company may be prosecuted,[87] but a judgment enforceable by execution against the property of an unincorporated association cannot, it has been held, be obtained in an action at law against the trustees of the property of the association.[88]

Doctrine of representation. Equitable procedure, adapting itself to modern needs, has grown to recognize the need of representation by one person of many, too numerous to be sued, and this has had its influence on the law side of litigation, so that, out of the very necessities of the existing conditions and the utter impossibility of doing justice otherwise, the suable character of an unincorporated association with numerous members has come to be recognized in many jurisdictions, and under this doctrine the association may be sued as an artificial person,[89] or certain members may be sued as representatives of all in accordance with the rule which will be considered in subsection a (3).

Waiver and estoppel. An association doing business as a legal entity may be estopped to deny that it is a legal entity for purposes of being sued in respect of such business,[90] or the objection may

(2) Under Enabling Acts

(a) Actions against officers
(b) Actions against association by name

(a) Actions against Officers

Under some statutes an action against an association may be brought against designated association officers as parties defendant.

In some jurisdictions it is provided by statute that an unincorporated association may be sued in the names of certain of its officers, a typical statute of this kind being one which provides that an association consisting of a certain number of members or more may be sued in the name of its president or its treasurer.[93] The purpose of such a provision is to do away with the inconvenience of having each individual member of the association named as a party to the action and process served upon him.[94] To sustain such an action the debt to be recovered must be one upon which the creditor might maintain an action against all the members by reason of their liability therefor, either jointly or severally.[95] In order that the action may be maintained it is not necessary that the president or treasurer should be a member of the association or interested therein.[96] In such an action it is not necessary to make the members additional parties,[97] but the fact that some of the members are joined has been held not to defeat the action as against the proper officer,[98] although the plaintiff may be required to elect whether it will proceed against the association, through its officer as party defendant, or against the individual members.[99] An action may be maintained against the president or treasurer to recover for a tort as well as upon contract, where all the members are joint tort-feasors,[1] but not otherwise.[2] Technically, in an action thus brought against the president or treasurer, the officer so sued, and not the association, is the party defendant;[3] but in effect an action of this character is an action against the association, and not against the individual named as

An appearance was entered here by the defendant in the name under which suit was brought, without, by motion, demurrer, or answer, raising the point of misnomer or misjoinder or legal capacity of parties. Under section 434 of the Code of Civil Procedure, all objections not so taken, and not going to the sufficiency of the cause of action or the jurisdiction of the court, are waived"—Herald v. president or treasurer.[4] The defense that the association does not in fact include the designated number of members must be affirmatively established by defendant.[5]

Suit as at common law notwithstanding statute

The statute does not abrogate the common-law right to sue all members of the association if plaintiff sees fit to do so.[6] A provision that, where an action has been brought against an officer of the association, another action for the same cause shall not be brought against the members thereof until after final judgment in the first action, and the return wholly or partly unsatisfied of an execution issued thereon, was held to apply only to the liability of the members as such; and accordingly, it has been held that an action may be maintained against both the officer and the individual members to recover damages for a tort where the individual defendants are charged with personal wrongdoing.[7]

(b) Actions against Association by Name

Statutes in many jurisdictions permit actions against unincorporated associations. These statutes in some instances contain an express provision to the effect that an association may be sued in its common or associate name; and in other instances the same result is reached by judicial implication of liability to suit from statutory provisions merely recognizing the legal entity of the association. The common-law right to sue the individual members of an association may coexist with the statutory right to sue the association.

It has been said that it is only by virtue of statute that an unincorporated association may be sued as an entity.[8] In some states statutes have been enacted which expressly or impliedly authorize the bringing of actions against unincorporated associations in their common name,[9] and where suit is brought under statutes of this character it is not necessary to join all members of the association as parties defendant.[10] These statutes, being in derogation of the common law, are strictly construed,[11] and the prescribed method of procedure must be strictly followed.[12] Accordingly, an action may be maintained against the association only in the name under which it transacts its business,[13] and where the statute, in one form or another, is by its terms applicable only to associations organized for, or in fact transacting, business, no association falling without the terms of the statute in such respect may be sued thereunder,[14] although such statutes have been construed as not restricted in their application to associations organized primarily for business purposes, but as permitting suit against an association formed for other purposes but actually transacting business.[15]

Choice of method

In suits against unincorporated associations, Code Civ Proc § 1919, permits an action to be maintained against either the president or treasurer to bring the entire membership before the court, although both cannot be sued, and if that method is not followed § 1923 preserves the common-law right of suing all, thereby giving plaintiff a choice of method.—Skolny v Hillman, 187 N Y S. 706, 114 Misc 571, affirmed 189 N Y S. 955.

15. Herald v Glendale Lodge No. 1239, B P. O. E of United States, 189 P 329, 46 Cal App. 325.

Elks' club

In permitting suit against an Elks' Club, the court said: "We see no

Associations and partnerships. Statutes in terms permitting suit against an association have been held applicable to associations which are not partnerships,[16] and statutes in terms permitting suits against partnerships in the partnership name, which will be considered in the title Partnership § 200, have been construed as permitting suits against an association on the theory that the latter is in effect a partnership as respects third persons.[17]

Right to sue implied from statutory recognition of association as entity. Following a doctrine first promulgated in the English decision of Taff Vale Co. v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, [1901] A.C. 426, in some cases where the statutes do not expressly provide that an unincorporated association may be sued as such, the courts have implied its liability to suit from statutory provisions recognizing the association as a legal entity,[18] as where the statute permits it to contract in its own name,[19] or provides for service of process upon a state official in respect of suits on contracts made by an association.[20]

Suit as at common law notwithstanding statute. As in the case of statutes authorizing suits in the names of officers, the provision under consideration does not take away the right previously existing at common law. The individuals composing such an association do not, by force of such statutes, acquire any immunity from individual liability, and it is optional with a creditor to sue either the association as such or the individuals composing it.[21] Accordingly a statute which thus gives a creditor an additional remedy, and so allows him to sue either the association in the common name or the members jointly, is not invalid as being beyond the power of the legislature, although it fails to give the association power to sue in the associate name, since additional remedies which do not take away or impair a right may lawfully be granted,[22] and furthermore the creditor may maintain an action against the association and the members thereof jointly.[23]

sufficient reason for restricting section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure to associations formed for commercial business. As already pointed out, the term 'business' has a common and general application to all sorts of enterprises which engage people's attention and energies. When a number of persons are associated under a common name in an undertaking in which the associates incur obligations for which they are legally liable, why should they not be sued in the common name which they have adopted, whether it is a money-making concern or otherwise? Indeed, the question of profit is the only distinction that exists between the two classes of associations suggested. If a number of persons were associated together, furnishing to their patrons for pay precisely the same accommodations, entertainment and service that the Elks' lodge furnishes its members, there would be no question but that they were engaged in a 'business.' Why should a different rule of liability exist because the associates happen to contract their liabilities in an enterprise in which they are catering to themselves? The word 'business,' in its broad sense, embraces everything about which one can be employed, and in its narrower sense it signifies a calling for the purposes of livelihood or profit. . . . Where the sense in which the word is used is open to construction, it should be accepted with the meaning most in harmony with the context"—Herald v. Glendale Lodge No. 1239, B. P. O. "Contracts are not contracts unless they are enforceable. To say that an association like defendant can make contracts necessarily means valid contracts—contracts that are binding on the parties and enforceable against them. It is an absurdity to say that defendant can make contracts of insurance but cannot be sued thereon. If defendant has legal capacity to make a contract of insurance, it has legal capacity to be sued thereon. If it is a legal entity when making such contracts, it retains such legal entity when sued thereon"—Clark v. Grand Lodge of Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, supra.

"It is true the act does not, in express terms, provide that suit shall be brought against the association under its associated name, but such is, we think, the effect of the statute when all its parts are read in the light of each other. It would be a vain and idle thing to provide that service of process should be had upon the insurance commissioner in all suits in this state arising out of such policies and contracts, and that such service should be valid and binding upon all subscribers exchanging at any time reciprocal or interinsurance contracts through the attorney in fact if the plaintiffs had to resort to the common-law method of procedure as to the parties to the suit. In order words, it would be useless to provide that suits should be brought against each subscriber in his individual name and that service might be had upon the insurance commissioner."—Lewelling v. (3) Parties by Representation

Under the doctrine of representation, which is of equitable origin, one or more members of an unincorporated association may be sued as representatives of all.

The equitable doctrine of parties by representation, embodied in most if not all of the codes, that where the question is one of a common or general interest to many persons, or where the parties are very numerous and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of the whole, is applicable in actions against unincorporated societies, and a few members are permitted to represent all the others as defendants, when their number is great or when some of them are unknown [24] In such case the court must be satisfied at the hearing that those against whom the suit is brought fairly represent the members of the association.[25]

b. Jurisdiction and Venue

The court may properly retain jurisdiction of an action against an association as such and its members as individuals, after dismissal of the action as against the individual members. The general rules controlling venue apply to actions against associations or their members.

Jurisdiction over a suit brought against an association as a distinct legal entity and against the members as individuals, is not lost by dismissal of the action as against the individuals.[26]

Venue. Constitutional provisions to the effect that an association may be sued in the county wherein the contract was made or to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arose or the breach occurred, have been construed as permissive rather than mandatory and as not preventing the beginning of an action in any other county within the state,[27] and it has been held that such a constitutional provision does not apply to a personal action brought against the individual members of an association.[28]

The officer sued is the "party" within a statute requiring an action to be brought in the county or place of residence of one of the parties.[29]

Under statutes to the effect that suits against an association may be brought in any county in which the cause of action, or a part thereof, arose, the "cause of action" referred to comprises every fact necessary to be proved to authorize and support the judgment [30]

c. Service of Process

(1) In general

(2) Effect of statutory provisions

(1) In General

To confer jurisdiction, process must be served upon individual members of an association where no different provision is made by statute. The strict common-law rule requires service upon all members to bring them into court, and ordinarily such rule applies unless changed by statute or by application of the doctrine of representation

In the absence of express statutory provisions as to the manner of serving process upon defendants in actions against unincorporated societies, the usual rules as to the service of process apply, and to confer jurisdiction the members composing the association, or some of them, must be named as parties and process must be served upon them individually.[31]

At common law and in the absence of representation or of statutes changing the general rule, service of process upon some individual members of an unincorporated association is insufficient to institute suit against all, or against the association [32] Thus, service of summons on the agent of a voluntary association is insufficient for the purpose of bringing the association into court, in the absence of any statute

Codification of equity rule

Although an unincorporated association could not be sued at common law by its name, and all parties were necessarily parties defendant, a statute authorizing suits by and against one or more of numerous persons incorporated the equity rule of procedure which authorized suits by and against representatives of the members of an unincorporated association of a large number of persons—Slusser v. authorizing such service,[33] and where the association cannot be sued by its society name, service of a summons on one of its agents is insufficient for the purpose of bringing the association into court.[34] It has been held, however, that it is sufficient to serve a member who has charge of the society's affairs.[35]

Service where part defend for all. Where, in accordance with the equitable doctrine of representation, a part of the members of an unincorporated society defend for the benefit of all, service upon a part acting for all as well as for themselves is sufficient.[36] In such case there must, however, be a due allegation of the representative character of the individual served.[37]

(2) Effect of Statutory Provisions

Where statutes provide upon whom service of process should be made in an action against an association, compliance should be made with such statutory provisions. In the absence of provision as to service of process in a statute expressly permitting suit against an association as such, it would seem that service may be made as in the case of corporations.

Statutes which change the common-law rule as to parties defendant in actions against unincorporated societies by authorizing suits against certain officers thereof, or against the society by its name, usually prescribe the persons upon whom service shall be had,[38] and where the statute prescribes the person or persons upon whom service should be made, such provision is mandatory.[39]

Action against association in associate name. In those states where actions are authorized to be brought against unincorporated associations in their associate names it is usually provided that process may be served upon certain designated persons. Service in compliance with the particular statute will be sufficient when made on the person or persons therein designated, such as service on one or more of the associates,[40] or upon any officer or trustee,[41] or upon designated officers,[42] upon the manager of the society[43] or its agent,[44] or upon its clerk[45] or the person in charge of its business,[46] as the case may be.

Where the statute expressly permits suit to be brought against the association as such, but is silent as to service of process, it has been said that the question of service should be answered on analogy to the law of corporations as to service of process under statutes, where no method of serving the corporate defendant has been expressly provided,[47] and in such a case it has been held that personal service upon the president of the association is sufficient.[48]

Action against officers of association. Where the statutes provide that unincorporated associations may be sued in the names of certain specified officers, service of process may and should be made upon such officers.[49] Although a statute requires that in suits against an unincorporated association service shall be made on the president or treasurer, yet service made on the chairman and presiding officer of the association is sufficient, if the society has no officer called president or treasurer,[50] but under such a statute it is not sufficient to make service on the secretary of the association,[51] and service of process upon a former officer is also insufficient, although he himself is an association member and a defendant, since the service upon the officer required by the statute is representative in its nature, and the debt is not his as an individual, and is not enforceable against him alone.[52]

If the summons is entitled against the president of the association, and service is made on the treasurer, judgment thereon is irregular, it has been held,[53] although more recent authority holds that the defect is no more than an irregularity, which may be cured by amendment, and does not deprive the court of jurisdiction;[54] in other words, the association is the real party defendant, and a summons directed to one officer may be served upon either.[55] Service upon A B, the treasurer, of a process directed to C D, individually and as president, constitutes a valid service as against the association, but not as against C D, individually.[56]

Where a corporation is the treasurer of an unincorporated association, due service upon such corporation, as by service on its managing agent, constitutes service upon the association within the meaning of the statute.[57]

Statutes as to particular kind of association. Statutes providing that associations that issue policies or certificates of insurance to their members shall be suable in any county where they do business, and that summons may be executed upon them by serving a copy of the summons and complaint upon any officer of such association, do not apply to associations which do not issue such insurance, and service upon an officer of a noninsurance association is insufficient to bring the association into court.[58] Service of summons on a nonresident association doing business in the state may, under some statutes, be effected by service on agent within the state, without service on any member of the association.[59] Statutory provision for service of summons in a suit against a "non-resident joint-stock company or association" doing business in the state by delivering copy of summons to the local agent was applicable to associations other than joint-stock associations.[60]

Statutes as to partnerships. Statutes to the effect that "several persons composing a mercantile or other firm" may be brought into court by service of process on any one of its members, have been held inapplicable to an unincorporated association not constituting a partnership.[61]

d. Condition Precedent to Action against Individual Member of Association

Under a statute a return of an execution unsatisfied on a judgment against the association may be a condition precedent to the bringing of an action against an individual member on the same cause.

Under a statute providing that, where an action has been brought against an officer of an association, another action for the same cause shall not be brought against the members of the association, or any of them, until after final judgment in the first action and the return, wholly or partly unsatisfied, of an execution issued thereon, a complaint should be dismissed as to an associate individually where the statutory condition precedent has not been complied with[62]

e. Pleading

The complaint in a common-law action against associates should set forth the names of the individual members; where suit is brought against some as representative of all, the facts warranting such procedure should be alleged; and under statutes authorizing suits against an association by action brought against the officers, the complaint should allege the joint or several liability of the individual members. General rules apply as to amending pleadings, and as to issues, proof and variance.

The general rules of pleading apply as respects the sufficiency of the declaration or complaint in an action against an association or the members thereof.[63]

At common law, in actions against an unincorporated association, the names of the members thereof should be set out in the declaration.[64] So a bill against several associations by name, which also joins with them as defendants in its caption a large number of individuals, but which contains no allegations showing that such individuals compose or are members of the defendant associations, is defective as against the latter[65] But where the individuals and corporations composing a voluntary association are made joint defendants, the fact that they are referred to by the associate name to distinguish them in their associated capacity does not render the complaint objectionable as an attempt to sue a nonlegal entity[66]

Under statutes permitting actions against unincorporated associations in the associate name, it is not necessary to set out in the process or pleading the names of the persons composing the society[67] Thus, in an action against the president or treasurer of an unincorporated association composed of seven or more persons, it is not necessary that the individuals composing the membership should be made parties defendant; and where it appears from the body of the complaint that an action is against a voluntary association of which a designated person is alleged to be president, the words "and others" in the title may be regarded as immaterial, since the body of the complaint controls the title.[68]

Under a statute authorizing an action against the president or treasurer of an unincorporated association consisting of seven or more persons upon any cause of action for which plaintiff could maintain an action against all the associates, plaintiff must, in order to maintain the action, allege and prove that all the members of the association are liable, either jointly or severally, to pay his claim.[69]

Where suit is brought against several of the members of an association as representing the entire membership, the bill must contain proper allegations as to why all the members are not joined.[70]

Although the articles of an unincorporated association authorize the bringing of an action on its contracts against its trustees, a complaint in such an action which makes the trustees defendants, but does not aver that they are sued as such, states no cause of action against them.[71] That a manufacturer, suing for an injunction against a labor union to prevent picketing, sued the president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America individually as well as president, and the secretary individually as well, thereby deviating from the provisions of Code Civil Procedure, was held not fatal to right to injunction, where in fact a cause of action was alleged against the president.[72]

Amendment. In accordance with general rules as to amendments curing a misnomer or misdescription of parties, which will be considered in § 155 of the title Parties [47 C.J. p 238 note 24–p 242 note 73], a mere misdescription of an unincorporated association as a corporation is subject to amendment,[73] although it has also been held that where suit is brought against a named organization alleged to be a corporation and it subsequently develops that the organization is an unincorporated association, and not a legal entity under the law, the defect cannot be cured by amendment as there is no party defendant before the court and nothing to amend.[74]

It has been held that a complaint originally brought against an unincorporated association, which could not be sued as such, may be amended by adding as defendants the members thereof,[75] or the individuals personally liable on the contract in suit,[76] or by allegations showing that the action was brought against an officer under statute.[77]

Where a voluntary association when sued purported to come into court and litigate the merits of the action, it would be assumed that its defense was made by and for the benefit of the members of its board of directors and plaintiff could substitute the members who were directors when the answer was filed as defendants.[78]

Where a judgment in an action against an unincorporated association is set aside because the summons was entitled against the president of the society and service was made on the treasurer, leave may be granted to amend by substituting the name and title of the treasurer as defendant.[79]

Where an action is brought against the members of a voluntary association, the names of members who are not liable upon the contract sued on may be properly stricken out.[80]

Issues, proof, and variance. General rules as to issues, proof, and variance, which will be taken up in §§ 512–546 of the title Pleading [49 C.J. p 780 note 50–p 818 note 81], control in actions brought against an unincorporated association or

On motion

Where plaintiff endeavors to bring into court an unincorporated association, designating it in the summons by its name, and alleging in the complaint that it is a corporation, he may, on motion, if the president of the association has been served with process, be allowed to remedy the defect and have an order substituting the president of the association as defendant in the action, and the complaint will be amended by striking out the allegation of the incorporation of defendant and inserting in its place an allegation that defendant is an unincorporated association.—Munsinger v. Courier Co., 31 N.Y.S. 737, 82 Hun 575, 24 N.Y.Civ.Proc. 175, 1 N.Y.Ann.Cas. 32

Sued right body under wrong name

In an action on a certificate of insurance issued by the "E. Society," plaintiff sued defendant as a foreign corporation. The answer alleged that defendant was a voluntary association, and not a corporation. It was held that plaintiff's motion to amend the title of the summons so as to substitute as defendants the names of the persons constituting this association was properly granted, plaintiff having sued the right body of persons, but under the wrong name, being misled by the conduct of the parties carrying on the business in the name of the "E. Society."—Evoy v. Expressmen's Aid Soc., 21 N.Y.S. 641, 66 Hun 636.

Affidavit denying existence of association. A rule of court providing that in actions against partners, the partnership shall be taken to be admitted as alleged, unless an affidavit be filed denying the existence of the partnership in relation to the subject matter of the action, applies in an action against an unincorporated association, if it is in legal effect a partnership.[83]

f. Evidence

(1) Burden of proof and presumptions
(2) Admissibility
(3) Weight and sufficiency

(1) Burden of Proof and Presumptions

The burden rests upon a plaintiff to show the liability of an association on a contract made in its behalf by a member, although the contracting member has the burden of establishing his own lack of personal liability. Transactions for the benefit of an association are, it has been held, presumptively made with the knowledge and for the benefit of all members thereof.

A plaintiff suing an association or its members on a contract alleged to have been made in its behalf by a member has the burden of proving the liability of the association or its members as by proof of the authority of the contracting member to represent the others or by showing their approval of his acts,[84] although the member making the contract has the burden of showing that he acted only for the association and incurred no personal liability.[85]

Where transactions were for the benefit of an association, all of its members may be presumed to have had knowledge of such transaction and to have enjoyed the benefit thereof.[86]

(2) Admissibility

Anything said or done in the formation of an association may be admitted to show the nature of the organization. Pleadings and judgments in prior suits against associates have been held competent to show that they held themselves out as possessing the capacity to be sued.

In order to determine the character of the organization, it is competent to prove anything that the parties said or did in the formation of an association.[87]

On the issue of capacity to be sued, it has been held proper to admit pleadings and judgments in prior actions against associates to show that they had held themselves out as having capacity to be sued.[88]

(3) Weight and Sufficiency

The general rules as to weight and sufficiency of evidence control in actions against an association or its members.

81. Pleading warranting admission of evidence as to ratification
Where an association adopted and ratified the act of plaintiff broker in effecting a sale of its property, it was permissible to plead that the contract of sale was made by the association in analogy to pleading that a contract executed by promoters and ratified by a corporation was a corporate contract, and such pleading was sufficient to warrant admission of evidence of the act of the company or association showing an adoption and authority to employ an agent.—Waurika Oil Ass'n No 1 v Ellis, (Tex.Civ App.) 232 S.W. 364, motion overruled 254 S.W. 1032.

83. Cronkrite v. Trexler, 41 A. 22, 187 Pa. 100.

84. Davis v. Wansleben, 271 P. 882, 94 Cal.App. 427.

Authority
In a suit against a political campaign committee for labor and material allegedly furnished for its benefit, the burden was on plaintiff to show authority from the committee or persons to whom plaintiff sold labor and material.—Humphrys v. Republican Central Campaign Committee, 132 A. 366, 320 Pa. 353.

Approval
Seller, to recover for goods sold and delivered an unincorporated association, on the theory that the act of a promoter of public entertainments in making the purchase was approved by the association, and that the latter was estopped from denying liability, had the burden of proof.—Davis v. Wansleben, 271 P. 882, 94 Cal.App. 427.

85. Haldeman v. Addison, (Iowa) 265 N.W. 358

Must show agreement eliminating personal liability
"In order to avoid personal liability, one who has contracted in the name of such a principal [an unincorporated association] has the burden of showing that there was an agreement with the person with whom the contract was made that he was not to be personally bound."—Haldeman v. Addison, (Iowa) 265 N.W. 358, 359.

86. Reynolds v. St. John's Grand Lodge, A. F. & A. M., 131 So. 186, 171 La. 895.

87. Harris v. Ashdown Potato Curing Ass'n, 284 S.W. 755, 171 Ark. 399.

Erasure of words indicating attempt to form corporation
In an action against subscribers of an association on a note executed in name of association, it was competent to prove that words in the articles of association, indicating an attempt to form a corporation, were erased and others substituted which could be construed as an intention to form an unincorporated association.—Harris v Ashdown Potato Curing Ass'n, 284 S.W. 755, 171 Ark. 399.

Vote as to incorporation
In an action against subscribers of an association on notes executed in name of association, exclusion of evidence that vote was taken at meeting whether corporation or unincorporated association should be formed was held error.—Harris v. Ashdown Potato Curing Ass'n, 284 S.W. 755, 171 Ark. 399.

88. Brooks v. Owen, 202 N.W. 505, 200 Iowa 1151, opinion modified on motion for rehearing.

In accordance with the general rules governing weight and sufficiency of evidence, the evidence in particular cases has been held sufficient or insufficient to show an agreement that a member contracting in behalf of an association was not to be personally bound,[89] or to show that associate directors were personally bound,[90] or to show authorization or approval by an association of a contract alleged to have been made in its behalf,[91] or to show that a purported principal for whom a person signed a contract was not a fictitious name but was an existing voluntary association.[92]

g. Trial

Actions against associations or their members are subject to the general rules in respect of questions for the jury and instructions.

On conflicting evidence it is for the jury to decide questions of fact as to the existence of an association,[93] authority of an officer to represent the association in certain respects,[94] execution of a contract in its behalf,[95] membership of individual defendants in an association,[96] and personal liability of members of an association.[97]

The usual rules govern as to instructions.[98]

h. Judgment and Enforcement

(1) In general
(2) Enforcement of judgment
(3) Remedy against members after return of execution unsatisfied

(1) In general

At common law no judgment may be rendered against an association as an entity, although under statute such a judgment may be rendered which will bind the joint property of all the associates.

At common law a judgment against an unincorporated association is void and cannot be enforced against the joint property.[99] Judgment entered in action on a contract signed by certain of the officers and members of an unincorporated association

89. Evidence held insufficient to show existence of agreement between seller of piano and superintendent of Epworth League, which was an unincorporated association, that the superintendent would not be personally bound on a note given in payment of piano purchased for the league, signed by the superintendent "Pleasantville Epworth League, E L. Supt W. D. Addison," so as to relieve the superintendent of liability on the note—Haldeman v. Addison, (Iowa) 265 N.W. 858.

90. Evidence held sufficient
In an action against a cooperative association and the members of its board of directors on a note of the association indorsed by the directors, evidence was held to sustain a finding that the directors indorsed the note as individuals, and not merely as evidence of authority of the president and secretary of the association to sign and issue it, apart from the presumption created by Neg Instr L. § 17 par 6—Herring v. Farmers' Co-op. Ass'n, 87 So. 271, 148 La. 557.

91. Evidence held sufficient
(1) To support court's conclusion that president of association had authority to sign note for it.—Roper v Alamo Oil & Refining Co., (Tex.Civ. App.) 284 S.W. 305

(2) To warrant finding that defendant fruit company, a voluntary partnership association, was bound by acts of acting treasurer signing and indorsing notes—Horgan v. Morgan, (Mass.) 124 N.E. 32.

Evidence held insufficient to support a claim for goods sold against an association because purchase was approved, and association was estopped from denying liability—Davis v. Wansleben, 271 P. 382, 94 Cal.App. 427

92. Evidence held sufficient to show that company, for which president signed its name to note, was not fictitious, so as to render him personally liable, but was a voluntary association—Roper v. Alamo Oil & Refining Co., (Tex.Civ.App.) 284 S.W. 305.

Northwest Trust & State Bank, 211 P. 286, 122 Wash. 609.

Or.—Fennell v. Hauser, 14 P.(2d) 998, 141 Or. 71.

98. Confusing instructions
Instructions that purchasers of space in a potato curing house would not be liable as partners for the obligations of a potato curing association was held erroneous and confusing, since if the subscription list was intended for the purpose of organizing an unincorporated association, those participating in the business would be liable for the obligations of the association—Harris v. Ashdown Potato Curing Ass'n, 284 S.W. 755, 171 Ark. 399.

Instruction held erroneous under evidence
In an action against subscribers of an association on notes executed in name of association, an instruction to find for defendants if the business was conducted in name of proposed corporation was held erroneous under the evidence—Harris v. Ashdown Potato Curing Ass'n, 284 S.W. 755, 171 Ark. 399 has been held valid as to such members, subject to be stricken as to other members who did not sign the contract.[1]

The names of members of a voluntary association against whom awards of damages are made and executions are to issue should be determined before the awards are made, and their names inserted in the final decree.[2]

Where members of a voluntary association, formed for business purposes, are liable to third persons as if partners, a joint judgment against the members is justified.[3]

Under statutes authorizing actions against unincorporated societies in the society's name or in the name of certain of its officers, the judgment in such an action is against the association as such and binding upon the joint property of all the associates,[4] in the same manner as if all had been named defendants and had been sued upon their joint liability.[5]

Where the record shows that an officer of an association was summoned individually, so that he individually, and not the association, was in court, under statutes permitting suit against an association by its associate name, a judgment rendered against the association is coram non judice and necessarily a nullity.[6]

Where an action is not brought against real estate, but against the members of an association, the absence of a decision therein affirmatively sustaining an attachment does not invalidate the judgment against the members, which may stand as though no attachment had been commenced.[7]

Amount of judgment. An award of one thousand dollars for services rendered during the year, as manager, clerk, and bookkeeper for an association was not excessive, especially where plaintiff had been receiving two thousand dollars per year prior thereto.[8]

(2) Enforcement of Judgment

Under a judgment against an association, execution may issue against its joint property, but not against the individual property of its officers or members.

Judgments against an unincorporated society may be enforced by execution against the joint property of the association,[9] although only the joint property of the association, sued as such, is subject to execution thereunder,[10] and, if the judgment is against the president of the association, his individual property cannot be taken thereunder as president.[11]

The property of a voluntary association represented by certificates and held by trustees may be reached and sold by a court of equity;[12] but a judgment obtained in an action at law against trustees for an association cannot be enforced by the issuance of an execution against property, title to which is vested in the trustees for the association.[13]

(3) Remedy against Members after Return of Execution Unsatisfied

Statutes in some jurisdictions provide for actions against individual members after return unsatisfied of an execution on a judgment against the association In the suit against the individual, the judgment against the association may or may not be conclusive of his liability.

In some states the statutes provide for an action against the members of the association after the return unsatisfied of an execution issued on the judgment obtained against the association.

13. Moore v. Stemmons, 95 S.W. 313, 119 Mo App 162.

Such a suit may be brought against one or more of the members without making them all parties defendant.[14]

Under such a statute, it has been held that a judgment recovered against the president or treasurer of an association for a debt owing by it does not estop the individual members, when sued for the same debt after the return of execution unsatisfied, from contesting their liability for debts of the association,[15] and, accordingly, where an action is brought against the individual members of an unincorporated association after a judgment in an action against the president thereof and the return of an execution unsatisfied, plaintiff must allege and prove, not only the original judgment and the return of execution unsatisfied, but also facts sufficient to make out the original cause of action against the association; and where the liability of the association is founded on a written instrument signed by an individual and bearing the seal of the association, plaintiff must show that such individual had been authorized to sign the instrument and bind the association, on the authority of such person being questioned.[16]

However, under another such statute it was held that a judgment obtained against an unincorporated association in the associate name was conclusive against all persons who were members when the liability merged in the judgment was created,[17] but persons whose membership had not then commenced or had then ceased are not thus bound by the judgment against the association.[18] The liability of the members under this statute is contractual in its nature, and therefore they may be proceeded against by trustee process.[19]

As has been pointed out in subsection d of § 36, return of an execution against the association unsatisfied may be a condition precedent to suing an individual member under such a statute.

§ 37. Actions between Association and Members

a. Right of action
b. Parties
c. Jurisdiction and venue
d. Pleading and proof

a. Right of Action

At common law, subject to some qualifications herein noted, actions concerning association matters will not lie between an association and its members. In equity and under applicatory statutes such suits have been allowed.

It is commonly said that, since an unincorporated association is in legal effect a mere partnership, the common-law rule forbidding actions between partners on partnership demands applies to actions between such associations and the members thereof.[20] This statement, however, seems too broad, since all associations are not partnerships, as explained in § 1. While the rule undoubtedly applies to associations formed for business purposes, a noncommercial association is in no sense a partnership, as has been shown in § 1, and accordingly it may sue a member thereof or be sued by him.[21] In any event an action will lie by a voluntary association against a former member thereof to recover funds or property in his hands belonging to the society,[22] or, subject to rules heretofore considered in § 31, to collect dues and assessments, and if the society loans its funds to a member, and he gives his note as security, payable to its officers or trustees, an action may be maintained on the note in the name of the payees.[23]

The rule against the maintenance of actions between associations and their members applies, of course, only at law, and does not prevent suits in equity between them.[24]

When dismissal of action not warranted

Where plaintiff, a member of a voluntary association, sued certain other members as indorsers of the association's note, the court, instead of dismissing the suit, on the ground that an action would not lie between partners on an obligation for which plaintiff associate was also liable, should have ordered that all the members be made parties under St (1911) § 2610, and all the differences settled.—Conway v. Collusion of trustees; right of one trustee to urge defense

In an action on a note given by trustees of an association, one of the trustees, representing himself and other shareholders, is entitled to maintain a defense on a showing that the other trustees were acting in collusion with plaintiff in attempting to enforce a note on which the consideration had failed.—McMillan v Greenamyer, 195 P. 734, 50 Cal. App 601 of all expenditures made by the association in carrying out the common object, the undertaking is mutual, the covenants of the associates being made with each other, and accordingly if one member fails to perform his covenant the others may enforce it by an action against him.[25]

Under statutes which authorize actions by and against an unincorporated association in the names of its officers or in the name of the association, it has been held that the statute gave the same right of action as in the case of actions between the association and third persons.[26] A statute allowing suits to be brought by one firm against another, although there are members common to both, does not authorize the bringing of an action by an association against one of its members, the party sued being named both as plaintiff and defendant.[27]

Suit to redress wrongs against association. The rule of corporate law that a stockholder may not sue to redress wrongs against the corporation unless and until it refuses to act on request, as set forth in Corporations § 564 [14 C.J. p 930 note 71–p 936 note 39], is inapplicable to a suit by a member of an unincorporated association against an officer thereof, brought in behalf of his associates and himself.[28]

b. Parties

The common-law rule barring actions against an association eo nomine applies to bar an action by a member of the association as such. Under the equitable doctrine of representation, however, suits between an association and its members may be brought by or against some of the members as representatives of all. Statutes regulating suits as to corporate office may be inapplicable to office in an association.

The common-law rule barring actions against an association eo nomine, as heretofore considered in § 36, ordinarily applies to bar an action by a member against the association as such,[29] and a member of an unincorporated association cannot sue the society as a partnership, even though it may be treated as such by other persons who have dealt with it, without making the individual members parties defendant, in which case it would be proper to name the association as a defendant.[30] The rule that an association can sue only in the individual names of all the members who compose it, as set forth in § 35, does not apply to bar an action by an association officer to recover property of the association wrongfully withheld by a member.[31]

Under the equitable doctrine of representation, suits may be brought by or against some of the members as representatives of all[32] Thus a bill

Particular statute construed

Conn.Gen.St. § 979, which provided that "any number of persons associated together in a voluntary association, not having corporate powers, but known by some distinguishing name, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, by such name," did not authorize such procedure where without it the action could not have been maintained.—Huth v. Humboldt Stamm No. 153, 23 A. 1084, 61 Conn. 227

27. Scott v. Gunnison, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 101.

28. Roberts v. Kennedy, 116 A. 253, 254, 13 Del.Ch. 133

"It is the opinion of the court that the rule referred to can have no analogous application to a case of the kind now before the court. This view is entertained because of the fundamental difference existing between a corporation on the one hand and an unincorporated association of individuals on the other The corporation, being an artificial person, has a distinct entity of its own, can hold and possess property, own choses in action, and sue and be sued in its own name Therefore, when its stockholders undertake to sue in its behalf, they assert rights that are the corporation's and which the corporation is capable of litigating in its own name Hence while the stockholders have an interest in the corporation's property, or interest which a court of equity will in proper cases protect, they cannot, in the absence of exceptional circumstances, litigate such interest unless the corporation, through its proper officers, first refuses to do so . But an unincorporated association of individuals such as is the Brotherhood in this case, has no identity of its own and cannot sue. The property and rights which are said to belong to it, belong in fact to its members . . . The interest which a member of such an association has in the common property is therefore in no sense indirect or derivative as is so with respect to the interest of a stockholder in a corporation. The members have a direct and primary interest of their own, which any one may assert in behalf of himself and all others against an officer charged with wrongfully using the common property without first applying to the so-called officers of the organization If the law of the organization provided that designated officers or members and only those could sue in behalf of all, a different view might prevail. But there is nothing of this nature appearing in this case"—Roberts v. Kennedy, supra

La.—Executive Committee of French Opera Trades Ball v. Tarrant, 113 So. 774, 164 La. 83, 53 A.L.R. 1233.

"We understand it is well established that suits in equity may be brought by or against some of the members of an association or trust like the one under consideration as representatives of all the members. This seems to be especially true in such cases where, as here, the defendants were managing officers or trustees Such cases simply declare the equitable doctrine of virtual representation, and the doctrine has in many cases been applied to members of unincorporated associations"—Davis v. Hudgins, (Tex.Civ.App.) 225 S.W. 73, 76.

may be filed by part of a numerous body of members in an unincorporated association to enforce a common benefit in behalf of all against a few of their associates who are specially charged with fraud, it not being necessary that all the parties in interest be made parties to the bill.[33] Where an association has ceased to do business, and has applied all its assets, and an indebtedness remains, and certain members file a bill against others to ascertain the indebtedness and to have the liability of the individual members apportioned, it is immaterial that the creditors are not made parties if the decree requires the members to pay the sum adjudged against them to an officer of the association, who is required to give security for the application of the moneys coming into his hands, since such officer is thus made a trustee for the creditors.[34]

Election of officer. An action by some members of an unincorporated association to restrain certain other members from illegally electing an officer of the association is not an action to determine title to office within the meaning of statutes regulating corporations, which must be brought by the people.[35]

c. Jurisdiction and Venue

By virtue of statutory provisions jurisdiction over an association may be acquired by service of process on a member. It has been held that an action for unpaid dues may be brought in the county wherein the association's treasurer maintains his principal place of business.

Under statutes providing for service of process on one when two or more do business as associates under a common name, jurisdiction over an unincorporated association may be acquired by service on a member thereof.[36]

An action by the treasurer of an association against a member to recover from the latter an unpaid proportionate share of the association's operating expenses is transitory in character, and, where association regulations provide that such money shall be paid to the treasurer, the venue of such action is properly laid in the county wherein the treasurer maintained his place of business as against the contention that it should have been brought where defendant member maintained its own principal place of business.[37]

d. Pleading and Proof

The general rules of pleading and evidence control in actions by and between associations and their members. A plaintiff suing on behalf of an association should aver that he is a member in good standing; and a member suing the association on a contract made with its agents should plead and prove their authority to bind the association

The usual rules of pleading apply in actions by and between associations and their members.[38]

A member bringing a suit on behalf of an association for misapplication of its funds must aver not only that he is a member, but that he is a member in good standing.[39]

A plaintiff, himself a member, suing an unincorporated association on a contract made by an agent thereof is presumed to have known limitations on the agency of those with whom he dealt, and must plead and prove the authority of the agent to create an association liability.[40]

General rules of evidence apply[41]

Accounting

(1) An unincorporated association is not an indispensable complainant in a suit by members for an accounting and to enjoin misapplication of its funds and misuse of its property —Roberts v. Kennedy, 116 A. 253, 13 Del Ch. 133.

(2) A properly designated officer of an unincorporated association may sue members, agents, and subordinate officers for an accounting, and to enjoin misapplication of its funds and misuse of its property, in the names of himself and other members in behalf of all.—Roberts v. Kennedy, supra

In action against members of unincorporated political party on agreement signed by certain officers, where the agreement annexed showed no intention to bind individual members, and the complaint did not definitely allege that the officers had such authority, it was insufficient.—Hale v. Hirsch, 199 N.Y.S. 514, 205 App.Div. 308.

41. Agreement not to collect certificate

A member's agreement not to collect a corporation's certificates of indebtedness, purchased with money contributed to the association, was held not established.—Houghton v Grimes, 135 A. 15, 100 Vt. 99.

§ 38. Foreign Associations

Decisions as to foreign associations ordinarily involve the subject of "actions," which will be considered in the next section. Later cases as to foreign associations involving other subjects than "actions" will be found in the Pocket Parts.

§ 39. —— Actions

a. In general
b. Service of process

a. In General

As respects actions by or against foreign associations, the statutes of the forum, and not the statutes of the state of organization, control.

In some states local statutes permitting an association to bring suits in its own name, as heretofore considered in § 35, have been held to apply to foreign associations.[42]

Statutes authorizing suits against unincorporated societies without making all the members thereof parties defendant, heretofore considered in § 36, are purely local in their operation and are not binding in other states,[43] and, where a statute of the state of the forum provides a method of suing an unincorporated association by its recognized name, the courts of that state are not bound to, although they may through comity, follow the methods of procedure sanctioned by the domicile of the association, prescribing suit in the name of the president or treasurer of the society, to the exclusion of the method provided by the local statute.[44]

The courts of the forum may have jurisdiction over unincorporated associations organized under the laws of another state and doing business in the state of the forum when there has been a compliance with local statutory provisions as to bringing suit against a voluntary association,[45] and a foreign unincorporated association doing business within the state of the forum may be sued as an entity under statutes of the forum permitting suits against unincorporated associations eo nomine or by action against an officer thereof.[46]

b. Service of Process

Jurisdiction over a foreign association may be secured by service of process on a resident agent in compliance with the law of the forum.

Where a foreign association is doing business within the state of the forum, service of process on its agent has been held sufficient,[47] and, where a foreign unincorporated association doing business within the state of the forum has failed to comply with local statutory requirements as to appointment of an agent to receive service of process, the courts will treat it as a quasi corporation for the purposes of process, and will accept as sufficient, service of process on any agent or representative of the association whose character in relation thereto is such that he could reasonably be expected to give notice of the suit to his association.[48]

Service on a resident corporate treasurer of an unincorporated association composed of nonresidents has been held sufficient, under statutes permitting suit against an association through suit against its president or treasurer, to confer jurisdiction on the court of the forum as respects the association of nonresidents.[49]

Fact of membership

Evidence held insufficient to prove membership of a person who deposited money with the intention of taking membership in a colony if his health permitted.—Ferguson v. Llano Del Rio Co., 6 La.App. 534.

Participation in vote for resolution

Complainant's testimony that he did not vote for a particular resolution was held insufficient to overcome the official record and invalidate the resolution required to be unanimously adopted.—Plemenik v. Prickitt, 127 A. 342, 97 N.J.Eq. 340, 36 A.L.R. 1527.

49. Bobe v. Lloyds, (C.C.A.N.Y.) 10 F.(2d) 730, certiorari denied Lloyds v. Bobe, 46 S.Ct. 472, 270 U.S. 663, 70 L.Ed. 778, and distinguishing Flexner v. Farson, 39 S.Ct. 97, 248 U.S. 289, 63 L.Ed. 250. But it was held that a syndicate of nonresident underwriters, each of whom contracted individually, which syndicate the state had made no effort to license, could not be sued by serving a corporation which exercised general supervision over the underwriters on theory that it was their treasurer, under N.Y. Gen. Assoc. L. § 13, permitting suits against associations by suing the treasurer.—U. S. & Cuban Allied Works Engineering Corporation v. Lloyds, (D.C.N.Y.) 291 F. 889.

ASSOCIÉ EN NOM. In French law, in a "société en commandité" an "associé en nom" is one who is liable for the engagements of the undertaking to the whole extent of his property.[1]

ASSOILE. Law French, to absolve, acquit, to set free or to deliver from excommunication.[2]

ASSOILZIE. In Scotch law, to acquit defendant in an action; to find a criminal not guilty.[3]

ASSORT. To separate and distribute into classes.[4]

Assorted cargo. As generally understood, the phrase imports the idea of a miscellaneous cargo, a freight distributed into various sorts, or kinds, or classes, any cargo constituted of different articles, or a fair assortment of different articles.[5]

ASSOUTH. Law French, quit, free, discharged.[6]

ASSUME.

Present Tense

It has been said that "assume" is derived from the same root as the word which designates the form of action based upon a promise,[7] and that its etymological meaning is "to take on."[8] In its primary sense, the word has been defined as meaning to adopt, receive or take up or into;[9] to adopt, to become bound as another is bound, or to put one's self in the place of another as to an obligation or liability,[10] to engage, promise or undertake;[11] to put on, or to take formally and demonstratively;[12] to take to or on one's self, to take upon one's self or to undertake, as to assume a responsibility.[13] In its derived sense, the word has been defined as to take in appearance only;[14] to affect, presume or pretend,[15] to outwardly seem, put on deceitfully or take the semblance of,[16] to pretend to possess;[17] to take fictitiously, as to assume the garb of humility,[18] giving the impress of an act calculated to mislead or baffle inquiry.[19] The term implies knowledge or information.[20] In particular connections, where supported by the context,[21] the word includes the duty of payment,[22] imports a personal liability,[23] and has been said to mean the same as the term "assumes to pay," or "assumes and agrees to pay."[24] "Assume" has been held synonymous with "affect," "appropriate," "arrogate," "claim," "counterfeit," "feign," "postulate," "pretend," "put on," "sham," "take," and "usurp;"[25] and has been contrasted with, or distinguished from, "conceal," "deny," "repudiate,"[26] and also "taking subject to."[27]

§ 1. Nature and Scope of Remedy

The action of assumpsit is the common-law remedy for the recovery of money damages for the breach of a simple contract.

The action of assumpsit[1] is an action for the recovery of damages for the nonperformance of an oral or simple written contract.[2] While in its origin and early development, assumpsit was an action ex delicto, a species of the action of trespass on the case, it has become, as discussed in the title Actions § 33, strictly an action ex contractu, a remedy for the enforcement of simple contracts expressed by the parties or implied by the law from their acts.[3]

Assumpsit is divided into two distinct branches, namely, general assumpsit, which is the remedy for implied contracts, and special assumpsit, which is based on an express contract.[4]

§ 2. —— General Assumpsit and Common Counts

General assumpsit, or the common counts, is a remedy of equitable character, although one at law, to enforce implied promises or contracts.

General assumpsit is an action of assumpsit brought upon the promise or contract implied by law in certain cases.[5] In this form of action plaintiff ignores the express undertaking, if any, and grounds his action on an implied contract springing from a consideration received.[6]

General assumpsit embraces what are known as the common counts, so called because they are general forms commonly used in practice for the various classes of claims arising most frequently in assumpsit.[7] These counts have been classified as (1) indebitatus assumpsit, (2) quantum meruit,

(3) quantum valebant, and (4) insimul computassent, or account stated.[8] However, two of these counts, quantum meruit and quantum valebant, are practically obsolete, and are regarded as being unnecessary in any case[9] since plaintiff may recover under an indebitatus count, although the amount is not fixed or certain[10] Of the two remaining counts—one, insimul computassent or account stated, is treated specifically in the title Account Stated § 58 et seq. Therefore, in this Title, when the terms "general assumpsit" or "common counts" are employed, they will ordinarily mean indebitatus assumpsit, or the indebitatus counts. Indeed, the three terms, "general assumpsit," "common counts," and "indebitatus assumpsit," have become, for all practical purposes, interchangeable, and are employed by the courts without discrimination.[11]

General assumpsit, although an action at law,[12] is a remedy of equitable character,[13] liberal in form,[14] and greatly favored by the courts[15] Notwithstanding, however, its equitable nature, it is not a substitute for a proceeding in equity to correct mistakes,[16] nor does it supply the purpose of an action on the case for fraud and deceit.[17]

§ 3. —— Special Assumpsit

Special assumpsit is an action of assumpsit which is grounded on the breach of an express promise.

Special assumpsit is an action of assumpsit brought upon an express contract or promise[18] In special assumpsit plaintiff's action is necessarily founded on some actual express undertaking or promise to pay money or to do or to omit doing some particular thing.[19] Whether the consideration be executed or executory is immaterial.[20]

It is the only remedy which is strictly grounded on the breach of an express simple contract,[21] and, where such a contract exists open and unexecuted, special assumpsit is, subject to certain exceptions hereinafter discussed in § 9, the only form of assumpsit available.

§ 4. —— Contract Essential

A contract, express or implied, is necessary to support assumpsit.

The action of assumpsit, as the derivation of the word implies,[22] is founded on an undertaking or promise,[23] and the courts have frequently and repeatedly stated that a contract, express or implied, is necessary to support it.[24]

While originally the action of assumpsit was limited in its scope to true contracts,[25] a true contract, in the sense that the parties have entered into an actual agreement, is not now considered essential,[26] as the courts have extended the remedy to include cases where the obligation arises not out of contract, but from the application of equitable principles to the circumstances.[27] In such a case the obligation and the fictitious promise out of which it, in theory, springs are imposed by the law without reference to the intentions of the parties and often against their expressed intentions, for the purpose of allowing the remedy by action of assumpsit.[28]

Criticism of broad use of term "implied contracts"

(1) "It is urged with much force that treating the action as in assumpsit, it is based upon a quasi contract, which it is a misnomer to call an implied contract, wanting, as it is, in most of the elements of a true contract. . . . It does not promote clear thinking to embrace in one classification two things so essentially different as an obligation based on the consent of the parties and one imposed by law, from motives of public policy, frequently against the intention of the parties. But, however unscientific such a classification is, simple implied contracts are usually subdivided into contracts implied in fact and contracts implied in law. The first, it is needless to say, is a true contract, the agreement of the parties being inferred from the circumstances, the latter but a duty imposed by law and treated as a contract for the purposes of the remedy only"—Nevada Co. v. Farnsworth, (C.C.Utah) 89 F. 164, 165.

Salary due under city ordinance

Under an act for the incorporation of cities, providing that the salaries of all city officers must be fixed by ordinance by the common council, it has been held that a city officer cannot sue in assumpsit, as on an implied contract to recover an alleged balance on salary as such officer there being no such implied contract.—Brasil v. 26. Contract in fact unnecessary

"It was not essential that there was in fact a contract in the sense that the parties had entered into an agreement, either express or implied, as to the subject-matter of plaintiff's cause of action All that was necessary was that defendant had received benefits which imposed upon him a duty to the plaintiff, so that upon equitable grounds a promise was implied by law that the defendant should respond to the extent of the benefits received Such a relation between the parties, because of the promise which had not been made in fact, but which the law implied, has been termed a quasi-contract"—Anderson v. Consideration. The necessity of consideration, however, is by no means dispensed with,[29] a valuable consideration is absolutely essential to support the action of assumpsit.[30]

An equitable estoppel may enable a party to maintain assumpsit, where in fact, there was no contract.[31]

§ 5. Grounds and Form of Action Appropriate Thereto

The violation of any simple contractual or quasi contractual obligation furnishes a ground for an action of assumpsit.

As previously stated in section 1, the action of assumpsit is an action for the recovery of damages for the nonperformance of an oral or simple written contract; this contract may be express or implied, or for the payment of money, or for the performance or omission of any other act.[32] In the absence of special statutory authorization assumpsit will not lie in any other cases.[33] The form of action for installments already accrued is not affected by the fact that plaintiff has certain articles of defendant which he was required to deliver on termination of the contract.[34]

§ 6. —— Express Contracts in General

Generally only special assumpsit can be grounded on an unexecuted express simple contract.

In general, if an express simple contract still unexecuted on plaintiff's side exists, the only remedy at law touching the subject matter of the contract is special assumpsit. Indebitatus assumpsit will not lie.[35] The several exceptions to this rule are discussed under § 9 infra.

Plaintiff may be held to affirm the contract with all its incidents when he brings assumpsit,[36] and a cause of action under an express contract cannot be so divided that recovery can be had partly on a general count and partly on a special.[37]

§ 7. —— Contracts of Record

Assumpsit will not lie on a claim of record.

Where a claim exists only as a matter of record, as a general rule, assumpsit does not lie to recover it[38] Under such circumstances an action of debt is the remedy, as shown in the title Debt § 2 [18 C J p 7 note 87], and in the title Judgments § 851 [34 C J. p 1083 note 37], § 870 [p 1108 note 28] The rule extends to cases where there has been a subsequent express promise to pay the debt[39]

§ 8. —— Instruments under Seal

In the absence of statute, assumpsit will not lie upon a sealed obligation

In the absence of a statute permitting it,[40] assumpsit can never be grounded upon a sealed instrument[41] If, however, there is a subsequent agreement, founded upon some new consideration to pay the debt or perform the contract or if the terms of the sealed instrument are varied by a subsequent simple contract, or by other proceedings constituting an abandonment or waiver of its provisions, assumpsit will lie on the new or modified contract.[42]

Where plaintiff has executed the consideration for defendant's covenant and defendant has failed to perform, it has been held that assumpsit will lie to recover the consideration paid.[43] Also, where promissory notes were given to secure the performance of a covenant, it was held that a merger was not effected, and that assumpsit would lie on the notes.[44] Further, it has been held that, if a contract, under seal, is so executed that it will not authorize a party injured by its breach to sue upon it,[45] if it is not the cause but only the inducement to the action,[46] if it contains no covenant for payment or performance to the party to be benefited, or to some other person for his use,[47] or if the action is against the grantee of a deed poll, although the promise is expressed therein,[48] assumpsit will lie.

Assumpsit will lie against a principal, where the sealed instrument was executed by an agent whose authority was not under seal, since in such a case the principal cannot be bound otherwise than on a simple contract[49] Likewise, it has been held that an instrument having both the form and substance of a bond, with the exception of the seals of the parties, may be declared on in assumpsit as a simple contract[50] It has also been held that an action for work done and materials furnished under contracts, one of which was under seal, where it appeared that there was nothing due on the contract under seal when suit was brought, could properly be treated as in assumpsit.[51]

§ 9. —— Implied Promises

a. In general
b. Promises implied in fact
c. Promises implied by law

a. In General

General assumpsit is the proper form of action when the ground is an implied promise, whether the same be implied in fact or implied by law.

distinct classes, namely, promises implied in fact, and those implied by law purely.[53]

b. Promises Implied in Fact

Assumpsit will lie upon a promise implied in fact arising from the circumstances and intent of the parties

In accordance with the general rules governing contracts implied in fact, as discussed in the title Contracts § 4 [13 C.J. p 241 note 37 et seq], where there are circumstances which, according to the ordinary course of dealing and the common understanding of men, show a mutual intent to contract, an action of assumpsit will lie upon the contract which the court will imply, called a contract implied in fact.[54] It differs from a promise implied by law in that the latter is fictitious, created by the law, irrespective of the intentions of the parties, for the purpose of the remedy in assumpsit,[55] whereas the existence of a promise implied in fact depends entirely upon the intention of the parties as manifested.[56] In keeping with this principle, it has been repeatedly held that no promise implied in fact can exist to support an action of assumpsit against the express declarations of the party to be charged, made at the time of the supposed undertaking,[57] unless such party is under legal obligation, paramount to his will, to perform some duty.[58]

c. Promises Implied by Law

(1) In general
(2) Existence of express contract

(1) In General

Applying the doctrine that one shall not be inequitably enriched at another's expense, under certain circumstances the law imposes a quasi contractual obligation, resorting to the fiction of an implied promise in order to make the remedy in general assumpsit available.

Since the remedy of general assumpsit includes obligations arising from the application of equitable principles to the circumstances, as already discussed in sections 2 and 4, and in accordance with the rules governing quasi contracts generally, as discussed in the title Contracts § 6 [13 C.J. p 244 note 62 et seq], assumpsit will lie upon a promise implied by law, which arises to prevent one man from being inequitably enriched at another's expense,[59] and it is essential to the existence of this quasi contractual obligation that defendant has received a benefit from plaintiff, the retention of which is inequitable.[60] The promise is a legal fiction, resorted to in order to promote the ends of justice.[61]

To same effect International Shoe Co. v. Dodd, 152 So 260, 26 Ala App. 46, certiorari denied 152 So 262, 228 Ala. 106

Included among the many classes of cases where it has been held that general assumpsit would lie, on the theory of a promise implied by law, are those of money paid by mistake,[62] claims arising from contracts unenforceable as within the statute of frauds,[63] consideration paid on a contract which has been rescinded and where the party rescinding has received nothing of value,[64] consideration obtained through fraud,[65] money paid as taxes under an invalid tax law,[66] sums mistakenly omitted in computing an account, notwithstanding a subsequent account stated between the parties,[67] obligations created by statute[68] although it has been held that in such a case the declaration must specify the statutory facts,[69] and, as shown in subsequent divisions of this section, some cases where there was a valid express promise.

(2) Existence of Express Contract

(a) General rule
(b) Limitations and exceptions

(a) General Rule

Ordinarily, the law will not imply a promise which may be a basis for an action of assumpsit where an express promise exists.

It may be stated as a general rule, subject to certain exceptions, that the law will not imply an undertaking, which may be the basis of an action of assumpsit, where an express promise exists;[70] but this rule is subject to a number of important limitations and exceptions, as pointed out in the following subdivision of this section.

(b) Limitations and Exceptions

aa. Express promise merely declaratory of what law would imply
bb. Express contract fully performed by plaintiff
cc. Performance not in compliance with express contract
dd. Termination of partly performed contract by mutual consent or by wrongful act of defendant
ee Liquidated damages

aa. Express Promise Merely Declaratory of What Law Would Imply

Where the express promise is, in effect, merely declaratory of what the law implies in the absence of a promise, plaintiff may elect either general or special assumpsit.

Where, by its terms, the express promise does not differ from the obligation which the law imposes under such circumstances in the absence of an express promise, plaintiff may, at his election, proceed in general assumpsit on the implied promise.[71]

bb. Express Contract Fully Performed by Plaintiff

Where the contract has been fully performed on plaintiff's part, and nothing remains to be done under it except the payment of money by defendant to plaintiff, which is nothing more than the law would imply against him, general assumpsit will lie notwithstanding the express contract.

Where an express contract has been fully performed on plaintiff's part, and nothing remains to be done under it but the payment of money by defendant, which is nothing more than the law would imply against him, plaintiff may declare specially on the original contract, or generally in indebitatus assumpsit on the promise implied by law, at his election.[72] Under these circumstances defendant will not be permitted to assert that an express contract exists, for the purpose of defeating a recovery on the implied promise.[73] Where the contract is divisible and plaintiff has completely performed with respect to any distinct part, the same considerations are involved.[74]

The ground of the action, where recovery is allowed under this exception to the rule, has been declared to be the promise which the law implies because of the situation of the parties.[75] The existence of an express promise does not make the remedy in general assumpsit available where, in the absence of the express promise, it would not have lain;[76] or, in other words, the facts and cir-

Past, completed, or executed consideration

It is generally sufficient to declare upon common indebitatus counts where the claim is merely of a pecuniary nature founded on a past, completed, or executed consideration. —Davis v. International Harvester Co. of America, 157 S E 584, 110 W. Va. 121, 83 A.L R. 994.

Sliding scale of charges

A provision in the contract for a sliding scale of charges dependent upon the number of lines of advertising space used does not take an action for a balance due out of the general rule that when a contract has been fully executed, and nothing remains but the payment of an agreed price, plaintiff may declare specially on the contract or rely on the common counts—Freese v. cumstances, aside from the express promise, must be such that the law will raise therefrom an implied promise.[77] There are cases, however, which, while not mentioning this rule, apparently do not follow it, and recovery in general assumpsit has been allowed even though under the facts it is doubtful whether such recovery would have been permitted in the absence of the express promise.[78] Accordingly it has been held, where defendant promised plaintiff that he would repay him his expenses if he took a trip to Europe, which plaintiff did, that indebitatus assumpsit would lie, since plaintiff had performed his part of the contract and nothing remained to be done but that defendant pay over the money.[79] Likewise, where the contract was for defendant to pay and for plaintiff to accept a certain sum of money in satisfaction of a claim existing in plaintiff's favor and against defendant, it was held that there was nothing for plaintiff to perform under the contract and that he might recover under the common counts.[80]

If something other than the payment of money was expressly undertaken by defendant, ordinarily the remedy must be on the express promise, and general assumpsit will not lie.[81] However, where the obligation was to pay tobacco, and at the time and place tobacco passed as currently as money, and judgments for tobacco were rendered, the rule was held inapplicable.[82] It has also been held that where defendant promised to give plaintiff a mortgage to secure a money obligation, a declaration in general assumpsit was unobjectionable.[83] Some decisions go even further, and allow recovery in general assumpsit of money judgments, where the demand was in express terms payable in property other than currency.[84]

cc. Performance Not in Compliance with Express Contract

Where, due to incomplete or inexact performance, the plaintiff is precluded from recovering the contract price, but is in equity and good conscience entitled to compensation, general assumpsit may lie.

In some cases where the express contract has not been performed according to its terms, but the performance of plaintiff, in so far as it went, was of benefit to defendant, the law will allow a recovery in general assumpsit to compensate plaintiff for the partial[85] or inexact[86] performance.

Similarly, plaintiff may recover upon the common counts, if that which has been done by him is beneficial to defendant, and has been accepted and enjoyed, or if his default has been waived.[87] A benefit of that sort, if it is not a perfect compliance with what it is stipulated for, cannot be accepted and utilized without making reasonable compensation.[88] Because something of value has been received and retained by one party to the contract, the law will not leave the other, who has contributed the valuable thing, wholly without remedy on account of imperfect discharge of his duty. It will deny him a remedy on a contract whose terms he has failed to observe, but will give him as much compensation as is fairly merited by his performance as far as it went, to be measured by the reasonable value of the benefit accruing from it.[89]

dd. Termination of Partly Performed Contract by Mutual Consent or by Wrongful Act of Defendant

The common counts will lie where the contract has been mutually rescinded or varied, or where performance is prevented by defendant's wrongful act.

The common counts will lie where a special contract partly performed by plaintiff has been put to an end by mutual consent of the parties, or where the original contract has been modified by a subsequent agreement,[90] and where full performance has been excused or rendered impossible by the act of defendant,[91] but only to the extent of the performance already rendered.[92]

ee. Liquidated Damages

The common counts will lie for a breach of a special contract where the damages are liquidated.

A recovery may also be had on the common counts although there is a special contract, whenever by its breach plaintiff is entitled to recover a sum in numero, or which can be rendered certain by a mere calculation.[93]

§ 10. —— Original or Collateral Undertaking

General assumpsit will not lie upon a collateral promise, the declaration must be special.

If the promise sued on is a collateral undertaking, the declaration must be special; but if an original undertaking, a recovery may in a proper case be had under the common counts.[94]

§ 11. —— Determination of Title to Land

Assumpsit will not lie to determine title to real property.

Assumpsit is not the proper form of action to determine title to land.[95] It has been held, however, that, if the question of title arises incidentally and the rights of the parties require it, it may be passed on ex necessitate rei.[96]

§ 12. —— Torts

Where the same transaction constitutes a breach of contract, express or implied, and a tort, the tort may be waived and action in assumpsit maintained.

In accordance with the general rules discussed in the title Actions § 50 a, if there is in fact a contract, and the same act or transaction constitutes both a tort and a breach of contract, the injured party may waive the tort and bring an action in assumpsit [97]

It was originally held that what was a tort in its inception could not by a subsequent transaction be made the foundation of an implied assumpsit,[98] and in general, under the modern rule, a tort cannot be the foundation of an action in assumpsit [99] It has also been stated as a general rule that the duty to pay damages for a tort does not imply a promise to pay them upon which assumpsit can be maintained.[1] On the other hand, in accordance with the rule discussed in the title Actions § 50 b (1), even where there is no express contract, and the cause of action arises out of tort, the tort may be waived and an action of assumpsit brought where the law will imply a promise on the part of the wrongdoer to reimburse the party injured by his act, but the ground of the action in all such cases is the quasi contractual obligation to restore the benefit received.[2]

§ 13. Persons Entitled to Sue

a. In general

b. Third person beneficiary

a. In General

General rules governing the right to maintain an action on a contract apply to actions in assumpsit.

The general rules governing the right to bring an action, as discussed in the titles Parties and Contracts, ordinarily apply to actions in assumpsit. Accordingly assumpsit must be brought in the name of the real party in interest, except in jurisdictions which hold that plaintiff must be privy to the express or implied promise declared upon, in which case the action must be brought in the name of the party who is privy to the promise declared upon.[3] Generally, assumpsit lies only on behalf of one who claims ownership.[4]

According to some authority a person having privity of estate but no privity of contract may maintain assumpsit to enforce the contract,[5] but according to other authority this right is denied [6]

b. Third Person Beneficiary

It is generally held that one for whose benefit a contract has been made may enforce it in assumpsit, notwithstanding he was not a party thereto.

In accordance with the rules governing the right to bring actions on contracts generally, as discussed in the title Contracts § 519 [13 C.J. p 703 note 88 et seq], although, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, the right is denied in some jurisdictions,[7] it is generally held that a third person may bring assumpsit to enforce a contract, made by others for his benefit, if it is manifest from

(1) Assumpsit will not lie for the wrongful detention of personal property, nor for the wrongful conversion of it, unless money or its equivalent has been received therefor — Capital Garage Co. v. Powell, 118 A 383, 96 Vt. 227.

(2) However, where a coowner of hay ratified an unauthorized sale of the hay by another coowner, the buyer of the hay was not a tort-feasor, and such coowner could sue for his interest in the hay in an action of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered — Martin v. Rutledge, 110 A 222, 94 Vt 258.

Misfeasance or nonfeasance of public officer

Assumpsit, as on a promise implied by law, is not an appropriate remedy against a public officer for misfeasance or nonfeasance in the execution of his official duties — Sanford School Dist No 2 v Tebbetts, 67 Me 239 — McMillan v. Eastman, 4 Mass 378 — Charleston v. Stacy, 10 Vt. 562 — 5 C J p 1390 note 97

Conversion

A recovery in assumpsit does not require proof of an express promise since the law implies the promise where there has been a conversion — Pacific Fruit Exchange v. F. E Booth Co, 283 P 944, 103 Cal App 54.

In Michigan, by statute, to waive a tort and sue in assumpsit, plaintiff must set up a special count, the common counts being insufficient — Kristoffy v. Iwanski, 237 N W. 33, 255 Mich 25 — Kirker v Larson, 236 N.W 896, 254 Mich 648

Hence it results, that the alleged violation of it is an injury to his legal rights, for which he is the proper person to bring this suit" — Treat v. Stanton, 14 Conn 445, 452

the nature or terms of the contract, that the parties intended to treat him as the person primarily interested.[8] It has been said that there must, nevertheless, always be something to connect the party sought to be charged with the transaction upon which the suit is based.[9]

§ 14. Persons Liable

Persons liable to an action of assumpsit have been considered in the preceding sections as the persons against whom the action will lie.

§ 15. Conditions Precedent

It is a condition precedent to bringing assumpsit that the demand be due at the commencement of the action if the claim is one that arises only on demand, such demand is a condition precedent to bringing assumpsit

Assumpsit cannot be maintained on a demand not due at the commencement of the action,[10] but this does not mean that a fixed or liquidated amount must be due.[11]

If the promise is made or the undertaking is implied in consequence of a precedent debt or duty, there is created eo instante the liability to pay or perform, and no demand before action brought is necessary.[12] If, however, by the express or implied terms of the agreement, the obligation to pay or to perform is to arise only upon request, the request becomes a part of the agreement and is a condition precedent to action.[13]

§ 16. Time to Sue and Limitations

An action of assumpsit must be commenced within the time prescribed by statute.

Following the rules governing civil actions generally, an action of assumpsit must be brought before the claim is barred by an applicable statute of limitations.[14]

§ 17. Defenses

General assumpsit is open to defenses of an equitable nature

In some jurisdictions strictly equitable defenses are admissible in actions at law, and in such a jurisdiction an action of assumpsit may be met by a defense which would not be recognized.[15] Even where equitable defenses are not ordinarily admissible in actions at law, it has been laid down that general assumpsit, being an action of an equitable nature, admits of almost every defense to which the defendant is in equity and good conscience entitled.[16]

11. Court will determine amount
Under contract between plaintiff, a boom company, and defendant, the latter took possession of plaintiff's boom and operated it for a series of years, the contract providing that under such circumstances defendant should collect the expense of receiving and delivering the logs from other firms and corporations, and should pay to the boom company its proportionate share of the ten per cent earned on the capital stock of the plaintiff The term "proportionate part of said ten per cent" was defined in the contract to be a proportion determined by the proportion which the defendant's logs and other lumber handled in any year bore to the whole number of logs and other lumber so handled It was held that, by virtue of Rev St c 94 § 10, an action of assumpsit would lie to recover the unpaid rental, although the parties had never been able to determine what items should constitute the net cost—Rumford Falls Boom Co. v Rumford Falls Paper Co, 51 A 810, 96 Me. 96.

Action transformed
Under the Pennsylvania practice, an action in assumpsit is open to equitable defenses, and when the real issue is not whether the defendant owes, or how much, but to whom the money owed rightfully belongs, the action is transformed from one in debt to an interpleader proceeding between the respective claimants—Montgomery v City of Philadelphia, (D C Pa.) 253 F 473

§ 19. Parties

a Plaintiff
b Defendant

a. Plaintiff

All joint creditors or promisees must join as parties plaintiff in assumpsit.

In an action of assumpsit all joint promisees must be joined as parties plaintiff or legal excuse for the nonjoinder alleged Otherwise there will be a fatal variance between the pleadings and the proof under a plea of general issue.[19] In keeping with the rules governing civil actions generally, as discussed in the title Parties § 130 [47 C J p 214 notes 32, 33], a defect relating to nonjoinder of parties plaintiff in an action of assumpsit may be raised by demurrer if the defect appears on the face of the declaration,[20] and if the nonjoinder does not appear on the face of the declaration a demurrer to the evidence will be sustained.[21] An additional method of taking advantage of such nonjoinder is by plea in abatement.[22]

b. Defendant

All joint debtors or promisors should be joined as parties defendant, but the defect is cured by a plea to the merits of the case.

Following the rules governing the joinder of defendants in civil actions generally, as discussed in the title Parties § 33 et seq [47 C.J. p 67 note 84 et seq], in an action of assumpsit, joint promisors should be jointly sued,[23] or a showing made that a promisor not joined is incapable of being sued.[24] In the absence of a statute to the contrary, advantage can be taken of the nonjoinder of defendants, however, only by a plea in abatement.[25]

§ 20. Process

The rules governing process in civil actions generally are applicable to actions of assumpsit.

The rules and statutes governing process in civil actions generally, as discussed in the title Process, ordinarily apply to actions of assumpsit.[26]

§ 21. Pleading

In the absence of statutory modification, the general rules of common-law pleading apply to actions of assumpsit

The rules of pleading applicable to common law actions generally, except as hereinafter pointed out, apply to actions of assumpsit. In the absence of statute, the common-law rules governing the pleadings in actions of assumpsit apply. These rules, however, have been modified by statute in most jurisdictions, and the statutory requirements in the particular jurisdiction must be observed.[27]

Framing of formal issue

Practice Act May 14, 1915 (P.L p 483) § 2 provides that in actions of assumpsit "the pleadings shall consist of the plaintiff's statement of claim, the defendant's affidavit of defense, and, where a set-off or counterclaim is pleaded, the plaintiff's reply thereto Under this statute, a record containing a statement of claim, an answer in the form of a petition to open up the judgment, and a reply thereto is sufficient, although it was declared by the court that the better practice to have the issue formally stated, and to incorporate the questions to be decided by the jury into the order, so that they may be answered specifically by the jury—Williams v. Notopolos, 103 A. 290, 259 Pa. 469.

prove under the plea of the general issue.[28] Statutory requirements as to the manner of setting out the demand must, of course, be observed,[29] but a complaint, under the codes and practice acts, in the common-law form is generally held sufficient,[30] although according to some authority a complaint in the common counts is insufficient as being inconsistent with the theory of code pleading.[31] Accordingly counts in assumpsit, which contain averments of defendant's undertaking and a legal consideration therefor, the breach of defendant in failing to keep that undertaking, and the injury to plaintiff therefrom, are generally sufficient.[32] Likewise, the common counts are generally not demurrable,[33] nor do extraneous matters in connection with the common counts, which are matters of defense, render them demurrable.[34]

If there is one good count the declaration will be upheld as against a general demurrer.[35]

Averment of jurisdiction. It has been held that in declaring in a court of limited jurisdiction, the consideration as well as the promise must be averred to have been within the jurisdiction of the court.[36]

Matters of aggravation. A declaration is not changed from one in assumpsit to one of tort merely by setting up matters by way of aggravation.[37]

Special agreement In accordance with the rules already set out in section 6, plaintiff, pleading a breach of a simple unexecuted contract, must declare specially.[38] In so declaring specially on an express agreement, the agreement should be set out either in terms or in substance.[39] While it has been held that plaintiff's statement of claim must set forth whether the contract was oral or written,[40] it is not necessary that the contract should be set out in totidem verbis.[41] The statement of the agreement need not be repeated in subsequent counts if it sufficiently appears in the first count.[42]

Surplusage will not vitiate a count containing sufficient averments.[43] If the essential facts are alleged, the fact that the pleader, in addition, places an erroneous interpretation upon their legal effect will not render the count materially defective.[44]

Tort and waiver thereof. Where the action is in assumpsit, it is proper to allege the facts which constitute a tort, and it is not necessary to allege in terms a waiver of the tort.[45]

b. Particular Allegations

(1) Allegation of promise
(2) Allegation of consideration
(3) Allegation of indebtedness
(4) Allegation of performance by plaintiff
(5) Allegation of demand or request
(6) Allegation of breach
(7) Allegation of damages

(1) Allegation of Promise

(a) Necessity and sufficiency
(b) By and to whom made
(c) Time and place

(a) Necessity and Sufficiency

The declaration in assumpsit must generally contain a direct allegation of a promise by the defendant, although under some statutes an allegation of facts sufficient to imply a promise is sufficient.

The general rule is that the declaration must contain a direct allegation of a promise by defendant. It will not be sufficient to allege facts from which a promise may be inferred,[46] although there is dictum to the contrary.[47] No distinction in this respect exists in common-law pleading between an implied promise and an express promise.[48] In every case, where the agreement is not in writing, the same words of description are employed to describe an implied as well as an express promise.[49] The word "promise," however, is not indispensable, and any word of the same import will suffice.[50]

This doctrine, as far as general assumpsit is concerned, it is said, is the result of the historical evolution of that form of action and the resort to fictions, so usual in the early history of the common law, in order to work substantial justice and meet growing needs without departing from the established forms.[51]

Where plaintiff's claim consists of several items which are set out, it is not necessary to aver separately promises to pay the several amounts, nor is it necessary that the amount averred exactly equal the aggregate of the items.[52]

A limitation on the general rule, recognized by some decisions, is that, where the declaration states in hæc verba an instrument which itself contains a promise or undertaking to pay, or some expression equivalent to a promise to pay, it is not necessary to set forth formally another promise.[53]

The effect of a failure sufficiently to allege a promise, it is held, is to render the declaration bad on special demurrer.[54]

Statutory modifications. In some jurisdictions the necessity of alleging a promise has been dispensed with by statutory provision.[55]

55. Swem v. Sharretts, 48 Md 408.

In Alabama statutory forms of common counts exist, and these

It has been held that necessity for alleging a promise has not been done away with by a statute providing that "the court shall not regard any defect or imperfection in the declaration or pleadings, whether it has heretofore been deemed mispleading or insufficient pleading or not, unless there is omitted something so essential to the action of defense that judgment, according to law and the very right of the cause, cannot be given;"[56] but under an identical statute, the opposite result has been reached.[57]

In the jurisdictions which have adopted the code system of pleading, it is not necessary to allege in terms a promise to pay, but it is sufficient to state facts upon which the law raises an implied promise.[58] Nevertheless, either an express promise should be alleged, or the facts from which it may be implied, otherwise the complaint will be fatally defective.[59]

(b) By and to Whom Made

The promise should be alleged as having been made by the defendant to the plaintiff.

When an allegation of promise is necessary, the declaration should allege that the promise was made by defendant to plaintiff.[60] In the absence of an allegation that the promise was made to plaintiff, it may be presumed that the promise was made to him from whom the consideration proceeded.[61]

(c) Time and Place

The promise should be alleged as having been made at a certain time and place.

Following the general rule of pleading, that the declaration should state the time and place of every material traversable fact, in declaring in assumpsit, the time and place of making the promise should be alleged.[62] The precise time, however, is not material,[63] unless it constitutes a material part of the promise declared on or the description thereof.[64]

Where an express contract to pay interest does not form the basis of the action, an averment of time from which interest is to run is immaterial, since interest is only an incident to the recovery of the principal debt.[65]

(2) Allegation of Consideration

The declaration must state facts sufficient to show a consideration for the promise alleged.

In view of the fact that the action of assumpsit is based upon a contract or upon a consideration received by defendant which would be inequitable for him to retain, the declaration must show the existence of a consideration in support of the alleged promise,[66] except in the case of bills of exchange, promissory notes, and such other contracts as import consideration, in which event the mere statement of the liability is sufficient.[67] In alleging the consideration for a special agreement, the whole of it should be correctly and explicitly stated.[68]

While the mere incorporation of a simple contract in hæc verba in a declaration in assumpsit does not satisfy the requirement that consideration must be distinctly and fully pleaded,[69] it is sufficient to state so much of any contract, consisting of several distinct parts and collateral provisions, as contains the entire consideration of the act, and the entire act, to be done by virtue of such consideration.[70]

Matters collateral merely, or which only go to limit forms do not contain the allegation of a promise—Murrill v Worthington, 46 So 477, 155 Ala 281

Ohio—Lape v. Linton, 11 Ohio N P. (N S.) 503
5 C J p 1395 note 35.

The considerations supporting the rule are that the promise to pay, alleged in assumpsit, was a mere conclusion of law from the facts stated, and as the codes only require the facts to be stated, they are sufficient without setting forth the conclusions of the law arising from those facts—Wilkins v. Stidger, 22 Cal 231, 83 Am D. 64—Kansas City First Nat. Bank v. Landis, 34 Mo. App. 433—5 C J. p 1395 note 37.

59. Smith v. Bentson, 15 P.(2d) 910, 127 Cal App (Supp.) 789—5 C J. p 1395 note 38.

Reason for this rule is that the code does not require such a liberal construction as will read into the pleading a substantive allegation which has been omitted therefrom Substance is just as essential under the code as at the common law—Conrad Nat. the future responsibility of the defendants, and do not enter into the consideration of their original undertaking, need not be stated.[71]

Past consideration. In a declaration upon a promise based on a consideration which was previously executed, it is necessary to allege that the act performed or sum paid was performed or paid at the request of defendant,[72] except where a beneficial consideration and a request are necessarily implied from the moral obligation under which defendant was placed.[73]

Raising objection Where the declaration shows no legal and sufficient consideration on the face of it, the defect may be taken advantage of by demurrer,[74] motion in arrest of judgment,[75] or writ of error.[76]

(3) Allegation of Indebtedness

A declaration on the common counts should allege an indebtedness to plaintiff.

If the promise declared on is one for the payment of money, as when the indebitatus counts are employed, it should appear from the declaration that the debt is due and unpaid,[77] together with the facts out of which the indebtedness arises.[78] In declaring, however, on a contract which has been performed and which has resulted in a simple obligation to pay money, it is sufficient to set out the indebtedness without specially stating the contract from which it arises.[79]

(4) Allegation of Performance by Plaintiff

If defendant's promise is dependent on plaintiff's performance, plaintiff must aver performance of his part of the contract or a legal excuse for nonperformance.

If by construction of the contract, defendant's liability is dependent on plaintiff's performance, performance or a legal excuse for nonperformance must be pleaded in the declaration.[80]

If, however, defendant's promise is independent, performance need not be alleged.[81]

(5) Allegation of Demand or Request

If demand is a condition precedent to the action, it must be pleaded explicitly. In other cases the general averment "though often requested, etc," is sufficient.

If a demand is a condition precedent to the action, it must be specially alleged in the declaration. In such case the general averment of "often requested" is not enough.[82] If a special request is necessary, it should be stated with time and place by and to whom it was made, in order that the court may judge whether it was sufficient, but failure to do so, however, can only be taken advantage of by special demurrer.[83]

If the promise is made, or the undertaking is implied, in consequence of a precedent debt or duty, as in the case of the common counts, it is not necessary to allege a special request; the phrase "often requested" is sufficient.[84]

(6) Allegation of Breach

The declaration must contain an allegation of a breach of the promise by the defendant.

It is a further essential to a declaration that a breach of the promise be assigned.[85]

The breach may be assigned in the words of the promise, either affirmatively or negatively,[86] or according to its legal effect;[87] but the allegation must be reasonably certain and definite.[88]

While several breaches of the same contract may be assigned in one count,[89] if there are several counts in the declaration, defendant should be charged with having failed to pay the several sums.[90] If one breach is well assigned, and others are not, defendant cannot demur to the defective averments but may, under the plea of non assumpsit, object on the trial against receiving evidence or assessing damages on any breach other than the one well pleaded.[91]

Both the breach and the promise must be alleged to have been made before the commencement of the action, if alleged to have been made after the declaration will be defective in any stage of the case.[92]

(7) Allegation of Damages

A specific allegation of damages is necessary only when special damages are sought.

Where from the fact of the breach the law would impute certain damages as the natural, necessary, and logical consequence thereof, such damages need not be specifically alleged, but are recoverable under a general claim for damages.[93] Special damages, or damages other than those naturally necessarily, and logically flowing from the breach alleged, must, however, be particularly averred in the declaration.[94]

c. Joinder of Counts

It is permissible to join the common counts with a special count. It is also permissible to join in one count a number or all of the common counts.

In accordance with the rule governing civil actions generally, discussed in the title Pleading § 87 [49 C.J. p 157 note 90–p 158 note 95], a special count in assumpsit may be joined with the common counts,[95] and, although the party seeking to recover on the special count fails altogether, he may recover on the common counts, provided the case is such that, supposing that there had been no special contract, he might still have recovered.[96] A declaration combining in one count several or all of the common counts is proper.[97]

The general rules of pleading apply to pleas in actions in assumpsit.

The general rules of pleading as discussed in that title, apply to pleas in actions in assumpsit. Accordingly, the plea in assumpsit should be an answer

Assumpsit based on fraud
In Michigan in an action in assumpsit based on fraud, granted by Comp L (1929) § 14007, joinder of common counts with a special count is permissible—Kirker v. Larson, 236 N.W. 896, 254 Mich 648.
Joinder of actions see Actions § 33.

96. Hazen v. Cobb, 117 So. 853, 96 Fla. 151—5 C J p 1400 note 89
See Millett v. McDonald, 200 Ill. App 149.

In Maryland
(1) It has been stated that a plaintiff cannot recover in the same action of assumpsit both on an implied and an express contract, and, having alleged both, the thing to be considered is whether the proof shows the express contract alleged, or whether there is a variance.—Bethlehem Steel Co. v. Dornberg, 108 A 474, 135 Md 121.

(2) In a subsequent case, however, the court said that the common counts may be joined with a declaration on a special contract, although there can be no recovery on the common counts if a special contract is established, since the evidence may fail to show a special contract but still establish services rendered under an agreement for which defendant is bound to pay compensation.—Conservation Co. v. Stimpson, 110 A. 495, 136 Md 314.

In Pennsylvania, apparently plaintiff cannot protect himself by adding the common counts, but must elect.—Lenderman v. Shuster, 18 Pa Dist. & Co. 371.

97. South Atlantic Dry Dock Co. v U S Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, (D C Fla.) 284 F. 723—5 C J. p 1400 note 90.

to all that portion of plaintiff's declaration which it assumes to answer[98] A plea which professes to answer the whole declaration, but which, in fact, answers only a special count, is bad[99]

Severance in plea. Defendants sued on a joint promise should not sever in their pleas,[1] except that a defendant may file a several special plea which goes to his personal discharge, such as infancy, bankruptcy, ne unques executor, and the like;[2] and if one defendant has matter of defense personal to himself, which matter is admissible under the general issue, he may avail himself of that defense, under the general issue, without severance.[3]

Demurrer. To a count assigning several breaches, defendant cannot demur to one branch and plead to others. He must plead or demur to the whole count.[4]

(2) The General Issue

The plea of the general issue in assumpsit is non assumpsit.

The plea of non assumpsit is, at common law, the general issue in assumpsit.[5] However, by some statutes the plea of nunquam indebitatus has been substituted for non assumpsit as a general issue to the common counts,[6] and in one jurisdiction the statutory general issue is "an averment that the allegations of the complaint are untrue."[7]

Pleas of nil debet,[8] non est factum,[9] or not guilty,[10] are not appropriate as pleas of the general issue in assumpsit. Nevertheless, it has been held that the plea of not guilty, while irregular, does present a substantial issue, and must be attacked by a proper and timely objection.[11]

Admissions by plea of general issue. Following the rules relating to admissions by pleas of the general issue generally, discussed in the title Pleading § 156 [49 C.J. p 280 note 26-p 281 note 36], it is generally held that a plea of the general issue admits plaintiff's capacity to sue,[12] and, under most circumstances, the character in which he sues,[13] although not always.[14]

As pointed out in § 26, infra, a plea of the general issue in assumpsit puts in issue every material traversable fact in the declaration, and in addition, a number of affirmative defenses may be shown thereunder.

(3) Special Pleas

Affirmative defenses may be pleaded specially, notwithstanding their availability under the general issue. A few affirmative defenses must be pleaded specially.

While as a general rule a special plea which sets up matter which is in effect a denial of the truth of the declaration may be considered bad as amounting to the general issue,[15] defendant is at liberty to plead specially any matter which admits that, in fact, a contract was made as alleged in the declaration, but shows that it was void or voidable for any

In Alabama
(1) When defendant's plea is in effect a plea of general issue, a demurrer on the ground that "it is no more than the general issue," is properly overruled—Trawick v. Hagler, 75 So. 152, 199 Ala. 664.
(2) The proper method of taking advantage of such a plea is by motion to strike—Denson v Kirkpatrick Drilling Co., 144 So. 86, 225 Ala. 473.
(3) However, if the general issue is pleaded, and in addition thereto a number of special pleas, amounting to the general issue, are filed, the lower court will not be put in error for sustaining demurrers to the latter—Denson v. Kirkpatrick Drilling Co., supra.

cause,[16] such as coverture,[17] duress,[18] illegality or want of consideration,[19] infancy,[20] or insanity,[21] notwithstanding the defense might have been available under the general issue.

Likewise, matters in discharge of the action, such as accord and satisfaction,[22] foreign attachment,[23] former recovery for the same cause of action,[24] payment,[25] performance,[26] or release,[27] may, at defendant's election, be pleaded specially.

It has been held permissible to traverse plaintiff's allegation of performance of a condition precedent by a special denial, although this under the general rule of pleading would be clearly demurrable as amounting to the general issue.[28]

It has also been held that a court will not be put in error for refusing to give leave to file special pleas, where the matter contained therein could be shown under the general issue, already pleaded.[29]

As illustrated in § 26 infra, some matters, such as tender, set-off, recoupment, discharge in bankruptcy, statute of limitations, etc., which cannot be shown under the general issue must be specially pleaded. As shown in the title Frauds, Statute of, § 265 [27 C.J. p. 369 note 13 et seq.] the statute of frauds may, and according to some authorities must, be specially pleaded.

b. Affidavit of Defense

Where a statute requires an affidavit of defense in place of a plea, the affidavit must be in compliance with the statutory requirements.

An affidavit of defense, in jurisdictions where such an affidavit is required, must be direct and certain, and the allegations must comply, at least substantially, with the provisions of the statute prescribing what shall be stated.[30]

However, judgment will not be rendered for plaintiff, notwithstanding the affidavit of defense is insufficient on the merits, where defendant filed in connection therewith a counterclaim in excess of plaintiff's claim, which plaintiff did not answer.[31] Likewise, judgment will not be rendered for plaintiff because of the insufficiency of the affidavit, if the statement of plaintiff's claim is not in the concise form required by statute.[32]

A statutory requirement that in assumpsit on a contract for the payment of money there shall be an inquiry of damages, unless defendant files with his plea an affidavit that plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything on his claim, etc., may be waived by plaintiff,[33] or he may by his conduct be estopped from setting up the statute.[34] It has also been stated that failure to object to an unsigned affidavit of defense waives the point.[35]

§ 24. —— Replication and Subsequent Pleadings

The general rules of pleading ordinarily apply to replications and subsequent pleadings in actions in assumpsit.

Following the general rules of pleading, it has been held that the cause should not be tried without a replication to a good special plea, since otherwise issue is not joined.[36] As in other actions, the replication must answer as much of the plea as it professes to answer,[37] and where there are several pleas it must indicate with sufficient certainty the plea or pleas to which it is directed.[38] If a conclusion to the country is proper, it must deny in express words the allegations of the plea.[39] It is bad if it contains a departure from the declaration,[40] or is double.[41] Stating the cause of action in the replication is not permissible.[42]

Rejoinder. As is the rule generally, a rejoinder in assumpsit must answer material allegations of the replication by stating material facts.[43] It must not contain a departure from the plea,[44] nor be double.[45]

§ 25. —— Amendments

Amendment of pleadings in assumpsit is allowable as in other forms of action.

In keeping with the rules relating to amendment of pleadings generally, discussed in the title Pleading §§ 275–322 [49 C.J. p 466 note 88 et seq], the declaration may be amended so as to increase the amount of damages claimed,[46] to change the alleged date of the promise,[47] by adding averments necessary to show a cause of action against both defendants,[48] by adding or striking out a party,[49] by the annexing of a bill of particulars,[50] or by the addition of a count,[51] provided no new cause of action is thereby introduced.[52]

An amendment changing the form of the action cannot be made, however,[53] in the absence of a statute permitting it.[54]

Amendment of plea. Defendant may also be permitted to amend or substitute his plea.[55]

§ 26. —— Issues, Proof, and Variance

a. In general
b. Matters admissible under pleadings
c. Variance

a. In General

Proof may be made of issues raised by the pleadings, and of such issues only.

Following the general rules of pleading, the pleadings in assumpsit must put in issue the fact concerning which proof is offered, or it will be rejected.[56]

Pleadings held sufficient

Under a statute providing that in actions of assumpsit the pleadings shall consist of plaintiff's statement of claim, defendant's affidavit of defense, and, where a set-off or counterclaim is pleaded, plaintiff's reply thereto, a record showing a statement of claim and answer by defendant in the form of a petition to open a judgment and a reply thereto by plaintiff was sufficient.—Williams v. New contract

A new contract relied upon as a defense, must be set up in the affidavit of defense, or else it is not in issue.—Steinberg v. Schwartz, 219 Ill App. 133.

Statute of limitations

Under a general replication to defendant's plea of the statute of limitations of three years, the issue was whether the promise was made within the three years, and proof showing a promise which was of a higher nature, and valid for six years, made

Where, however, the pleadings do raise the issue, matter in proof thereof is relevant.[57] Accordingly, where plaintiff has employed the common counts he may prove thereunder matters which, although not specifically set out, are embraced in the broad language of the counts.[58]

b. Matters Admissible under Pleadings

The general issue in assumpsit being very comprehensive, under it may be proven almost every defense existing at the time suit was brought.

In practice the plea of the general issue is comprehensive;[59] under it defendant is permitted to show almost every defense which tends to prove that no cause of action existed at the time when the suit was brought, whether such defense arises from an inherent defect in the original promise, or from a subsequent extinguishment of the liability after it was incurred.[60]

On a strict construction of the language of the plea of non assumpsit it would naturally operate only as a denial of the express promise, where one is alleged, or of the existence of circumstances from which a promise might be implied by law,[61] and this was formerly the law.[62] However, a practice grew up and came to be firmly established of allowing under the plea of non assumpsit evidence of various defenses, which admitted all the essential facts stated in the declaration but avoided their effect.[63]

Applying this rule, defendant may generally give in evidence, under the plea of non assumpsit, accord and satisfaction,[64] coverture,[65] drunkenness,[66] foreign attachment or garnishment,[67] former recovery,[68] fraud,[69] infancy,[70] insanity,[71] payment,[72] per-five years before, was not relevant, and therefore properly rejected—McDermott v McCormick, 4 Harr.(Del.) 543.

57. Bean v. Camden Lumber & Fuel Co, 126 A 285, 124 Me 102

Evidence held admissible

In assumpsit upon the common counts for services rendered and materials furnished, with a special count for damages to personal property by reason of defendant's failure to keep leased premises in tenantable condition, where defendant pleaded non assumpsit, evidence relevant and material under the special count was relevant and material to the issues raised by the pleadings—Wilson Bros Garage v. Larrow, 98 A. 902, 90 Vt. 413.

58. Flannigan v. Monongahela Tie & Lumber Co, 87 S E 165, 77 W. Va. 158.

Not restricted to express contract

Demand due and unpaid

Where a complaint in assumpsit alleged that the demand was due and unpaid, defendant's plea of the general issue put that fact in issue—Outcault Adv. Co. v. Hooten, (Ala App.) 66 So. 901.

Inconsistent statements

Previous statements or admissions made by plaintiff, inconsistent with his testimony, to the effect that defendant was indebted to him, and tending to prove that plaintiff was not in fact a creditor of defendant, are admissible on this issue.—Myrick v. Wallace, 59 So 704, 5 Ala App. 398.

Part payment in property is admissible under the general issue—Munn v. Pope, 2 Stew.(Ala.) 498

Payment and accord and satisfaction distinguished

Under a statute providing that accords must be specially pleaded, satisfaction and payment are distinguishable—Brace v. Catlin, 1 Day (Conn.) 275.

In Mississippi, by statute, an administrator of an estate in any ac-formance,[73] prevention of performance by plaintiff,[74] release,[75] waiver or estoppel,[76] usury[77] want, illegality, or failure of consideration,[78] nonperformance by plaintiff,[79] also absence of joint liability of defendants,[80] existence of an unfulfilled condition precedent,[81] plaintiff's capacity to sue,[82] rescission,[83] that plaintiff has no title to the chose in action in question,[84] or that the action was prematurely brought.[85]

On the other hand, since such defenses as a discharge in bankruptcy,[86] the statute of limitations,[87] and tender[88] do not contest liability, showing only that no action can be maintained, they cannot be shown under the general issue, such matters, to be available, must be pleaded specially. According to some authorities, evidence showing that the agreement was within the statute of frauds is admissible under the general issue, while other authorities hold that the statute must be specially pleaded, see the title Frauds, Statute of § 265 [27 C.J. p 369 note 13 et seq].

Cross demands, whether set-off[89] or recoupment,[90] cannot be set up under the general issue. This does not mean, however, that defendant cannot introduce matters showing the absence of liability on his part, as such matters are admissible under the general issue[91]

Matters of defense arising after suit brought can-tion at law may prove any defense under the general issue, and this statute applies to actions of assumpsit—Gray v. Thomas, 12 Sm. & M. 111.

In West Virginia

(1) By construction of statute, payment in full, or general payment, is admissible under the general issue, as at common law, but partial payment must be specially pleaded—Schmulbach v. (2) Accordingly, in assumpsit to recover money loaned, defendant's testimony that check, alleged evidence of loan, constituted payment of indebtedness owing by plaintiff, was admissible under the general issue as not constituting matter of set-off or partial payment required by statute to be specified—Bielec v. Romanek, 169 S.E. 409

Work unskillfully done

Defendant in assumpsit may show under the general issue, by way of reduction of damages, that work was unskillfully done or that goods were not of the quality warranted, but he cannot show a breach by plaintiff of stipulations independent of those on which plaintiff seeks to recover, even though they are included in the same contract on which the action is brought—Keyes v. not be given in evidence under the general issue to defeat the action,[92] but may be shown thereunder for the purpose of reducing the amount of recovery.[93]

c. Variance

A material variance between the allegations in the declaration and the proof is fatal.

Following the rules governing civil actions generally, in assumpsit the proof must conform to the pleadings.[94] A party does not recover on the proofs alone; he recovers secundum allegata et probata.[95] It is not enough that the evidence may show a cause of action; it must show the cause of action pleaded.[96]

Plaintiff, however, is not bound to prove all the causes of action set out in his declaration,[97] nor is he required to adhere rigidly to allegations not of the essence of his cause of action.[98] Accordingly, a variance with regard to the amount due,[99] the time of the promise,[1] or the place where the promise was made,[2] is immaterial.

Although the allegata and probata may not entirely agree, if defendant is not misled, and the variance does not in any manner affect the trial on its merits, or set up a different cause of action, or impose a different burden on defendant, the variance will not be fatal.[3]

In promise or agreement. If the declaration is special the contract offered in evidence must be an express contract, corresponding in substance and in terms with the allegations of the declaration; variance in this respect is fatal, if insisted on.[4] Accordingly a variance between an allegation based solely upon the breach of a special contract and proof of the breach of an implied contract is fatal.[5] On the other hand, if plaintiff declares on a special contract, proof of an implied contract under a general count is not a fatal variance.[6] Also, plaintiff may, in a proper case, sustain the allegations of a common count by proof of an express contract,[7] and it has been held that a declaration in general assumpsit could be supported by proof of either an express or implied contract, in the absence of objection.[8]

Under a declaration against joint promisors, plaintiff must prove a case against all who are served, unless one sets up a defense which goes to his personal discharge.[9] Notwithstanding no plea denying joint liability is interposed in an action of assumpsit, yet there can be no recovery by plaintiff unless the evidence shows the joint liability of all the defendants to the action.[10] Conversely, where plaintiffs sue jointly, proof of a liability from defendant to only one plaintiff will be rejected, as it does not support the cause of action disclosed in the declaration.[11]

Indebtedness running to third party
Although the plaintiff in assumpsit proved indebtedness due from defendant to another, she could not recover where she failed to show any indebtedness to herself, or how or why she should recover a judgment or recover on an indebtedness due the other—Mobile West Shore Traction Co. v. Austill, 73 So. 4, 197 Ala. 432

Tenancy alleged
Where the declaration in assumpsit for use and occupation proceeds on the theory of a tenancy, proof of trespass and tortious occupation is a variance, and plaintiff's case is properly excluded from the jury.—Smith v. Haight, 154 N.W. 563, 188 Mich. 512.

3. Proof may go beyond allegations
Where, in assumpsit, plaintiff's statement sets forth an oral contract, and the proofs establish the oral contract, and further show a confirmatory letter addressed to defendant and in his possession, the failure of the statement to set forth the letter is not a fatal variance.—Tarentum Lumber Co. v. Joint plea
If plaintiff declares on a joint liability, and there is a joint plea by defendants, plaintiff's proof of a several contract is a variance, and under it he cannot recover at all.—Sullivan v. Mulvihill, 252 Ill.App. 567.

10. M. W. Powell Co. v. Finn, 64 N.E. 1036, 198 Ill. 567—5 C.J. p. 1409 note 8.

11. Ulmer v. Cunningham, 2 Me. 117—5 C.J. p. 1409 note 9.

The consideration of the promise must be proved as laid in the declaration,[12] and, if plaintiff declares on two considerations, he must aver and prove performance of both, for the assumpsit on the part of defendant is presumed to be founded on both, taken together.[13] Thus, an allegation of consideration in addition to the true one results in a fatal variance.[14]

§ 27. —— Defects, Objections, and Aider by Verdict or Judgment

Technical defects in the pleadings, or slight variances in the proof, to which there has been no objection, may be cured by the verdict or judgment.

In accordance with the rule in civil actions generally governing defects in and objection to the pleadings and cure or waiver thereof, as discussed in the title Pleading § 547 et seq [49 C.J. p 818 note 83 et seq], it may be stated as a general rule that in assumpsit, as in other common law actions, mere technical defects in a pleading, notwithstanding they might have been reached by demurrer, are cured by a verdict,[15] such as a defective allegation of a promise made by defendant,[16] a defective allegation of the breach of defendant's promise,[17] a failure to allege that the consideration was executed at the request of defendant,[18] a failure to allege a special demand on defendant,[19] a defective plea of not guilty,[20] a failure to attack a plea as not being the general issue.[21] However, a pleading which does not state a cause of action or a defense is not so cured;[22] but it has been held that a judgment founded upon mispleading so gross that no issue was presented would not be disturbed on writ of error, the mispleading being cured by the verdict, under the statute of jeofails.[23]

Likewise, it has been held that a slight variance between the allegations and the proof may be cured by failure to object at the time the evidence is offered.[24]

§ 28. Evidence

The general rules concerning evidence in civil actions apply to actions of assumpsit.

As in other civil actions, the burden is on the party who affirmatively sets up any matter upon which issue is taken to establish it[25] by evidence sufficiently clear and satisfactory to enable the jury to intelligently make the necessary findings.[26] Accordingly, if the evidence adduced by plaintiff is so vague and unsatisfactory that no finding can be intelligently based upon it, the necessary result will be a verdict for defendant.[27]

The presumption of an implied assumpsit arising from the facts shown may be repelled by evidence of an express agreement, of general usage, or of the relations between the parties and surrounding circumstances.[28]

Admissibility. Following general rules, evidence which is relevant and material is admissible, and that which is irrelevant or immaterial is inadmissible.[29] Where plaintiff's action on the common

Proof of special contract

To recover on common counts for work done under contract, the burden was on plaintiff to show that contract was made with defendant, and if entire, was fully performed, except for payment of agreed price.—Denson v. Kirkpatrick Drilling Co., 144 So. 86, 225 Ala. 473.

Title

In assumpsit to recover the value of personal property claimed to have been converted by defendant, it is not enough that plaintiff merely discredit defendant's title, but plaintiff must establish his own title.—Capital Garage Co. v. Powell, 118 A. 883, 96 Vt. 227.

Evidence held admissible

(1) In an action to recover a sum of money equal to what certain work counts grows out of an express contract, the express contract, or matter evidencing it,[30] is admissible to show the terms of the contract and to fix the amount due,[31] since ordinarily the contract price or rate is the best evidence of such amount,[32] and prima facie establishes it.[33]

Sufficiency. The evidence must be sufficient to sustain a verdict.[34]

§ 29. Trial

The general rules of trial are treated in the title Trial. See also infra §§ 30–32.

§ 30. —— Questions of Law and Fact

Questions of law are for the court, and questions of fact are for the jury.

In assumpsit, as in other civil actions, questions of law are for the court, while questions of fact are for the jury.[35]

§ 31. —— Instructions

General rules concerning instructions apply to assumpsit.

The principles governing instructions in civil actions generally, as treated in the title Trial, apply in actions of assumpsit.[36]

§ 32. —— Verdict

The general rules relating to verdicts apply to actions of assumpsit

As in civil actions generally, the verdict must would have cost, if performed, upon the hypothesis of an agreement to pay such sum, proof of a substantial portion of such estimated cost is admissible, notwithstanding its insufficiency to establish the full or exact amount thereof, and the inability of plaintiff to do so by other evidence—Cochran v. Craig, 106 S.E. 633, 88 W.Va. 281.

(2) In an action based on plaintiff's agreement to pay a debt of a third person to defendant, there was no reversible error in allowing debtor to testify as to what property was included in his mortgage to defendant.—Williams v. Shows, 73 So. 99, 197 Ala. 596.

(3) In an action of assumpsit for money due plaintiff under an agreement to pay defendant debt of a third person, it was proper to permit defendant to show by debtor's testimony how much the debtor owed defendant.—Williams v. Shows, supra.

(4) Where plaintiff declared in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, and not upon a written contract, a written order for the goods, signed by defendant was held admissible.—Simons v. American Box Ball Co., 166 S.W. 224, 158 Ky. 631.

Evidence held immaterial

In an action of assumpsit, evidence as to whether a third party suing defendant had a lien on the cotton involved was immaterial.—Williams v. Shows, 73 So. 99, 197 Ala. 596.

Contract held admissible

In assumpsit on an account annexed and on the money counts for the price of logs, where defendant admitted delivery of more logs than were called for by a special agreement, defendant's objections to the form of the action and to the admission of the agreement in evidence cannot be sustained.—Mercier v. James Murchie's Sons Co., 90 A. 722, 112 Me. 72.

Services under contract

Plaintiffs, who rendered services under an express contract, may sue in assumpsit on the quantum meruit, and give in evidence the special contract for the purpose of fixing the value of their services.—Hollander v. Kaufmann, 158 N.Y.S. 195, 172 App.Div. 218.

Contract not renewed

Where there was an express contract for services, which had expired, and the services continued without an express renewal, it was held that the amount fixed by the parties in the original contract was the best evidence of the value of the services in a suit on the common counts.—Wallace v. Floyd, 29 Pa. 184, 72 Am.D. 620.

Question for jury

In an action of assumpsit, wherein defendant sought to set off claim for board furnished to plaintiff, whether plaintiff was a guest of defendant at his invitation and whether payment of board was ever agreed to or anticipated was held for the jury.—Joyner v. McMurphy, (Ala.App.) 163 So. 533.

36. Weaver v. Murray, 128 N.W. 1088, 163 Mich. 660.—5 C.J. p. 1410 note 30.

Ignoring issues or evidence

A charge that if the jury find that be responsive to the issues raised by the pleadings[37]

A general verdict will be upheld where there are several counts, if any one of the counts is good.[38]

Where special findings are manifestly inconsistent with each other or with the general verdict, the whole verdict will be set aside.[39]

A verdict for plaintiff should assess the amount of damages to which he is entitled; a mere finding for him is not a sufficient foundation for a judgment.[40]

§ 33. Judgment

A proper judgment should be entered.

A judgment in plaintiff's favor in assumpsit is that he shall recover a specified sum for damages sustained by reason of defendant's nonperformance of his promises and undertakings.[41]

It has also been held that a judgment substantially expressing the conclusions of the court is sufficient, although not expressed with technical nicety.[42]

By default. In the absence of special regulation by statute or of established practice of court, a jury should be called to assess damages when a default is entered[43] Upon the trial of the issue of damages under a writ of inquiry a defense which goes to the right of recovery cannot be made.[44]

On demurrer. In like manner it has been held that, on the overruling of a demurrer to a declaration containing the common counts, final judgment cannot be rendered without a writ of inquiry to ascertain the damages.[45] It has also been held that final judgment cannot be taken, on the overruling of a demurrer to a count of the declaration, if defendant has interposed a plea to another count, and the issue raised by such plea has not been disposed of.[46]

§ 34. Review

The general rules of review, although involving actions in assumpsit, are considered in the title Appeal and Error. For future cases, if any, raising questions peculiar to the action of assumpsit, examine Pocket Parts.

§ 35. Costs

The rules of civil actions generally govern the taxation of costs in actions of assumpsit.

Following rules applicable to civil actions generally, it has been held in an action against joint promisors, notwithstanding that an improper severance in pleas was allowed by plaintiff without objection, that the costs of defendants could not be taxed severally[47] According to some authority, in an action of assumpsit, attorneys' commissions should be allowed as costs in favor of the prevailing party.[48]

§ 36. Damages

In assumpsit plaintiff is limited to a recovery of damages arising directly from the breach of the contract, or the value of the consideration from which the promise is implied.

The damages to be recovered must always depend upon the nature of the action and the circumstances of the case.[49] Ordinarily plaintiff is limited to damages arising directly from the breach of the contract; the willfulness or wantonness of the breach and other circumstances incidentally connected therewith have nothing to do with the case; the sole question is what is the pecuniary value of the contract right taken from plaintiff.[50]

there was a contract for materials to be furnished and work done by plaintiff for defendant for a special sum, and that other materials in question were furnished and other work done by plaintiff for defendant, they must find for plaintiff for the sum, if any, due under the contract, was erroneous as allowing a recovery in general assumpsit where plaintiff has not performed his part of the contract, without submitting the questions whether his failure was due to defendant's fault, or whether the work actually done was accepted by defendant.—Meyer v. 50. Frankfort Land Co. v. Hughett, 191 S.W. 530, 137 Tenn. 32—5 C.J. p 1411 note 44.

Special damages are not recoverable under the common counts; the amount recoverable is ordinarily the actual value of the services or goods, or the sum received or paid, etc.[51]

Where an express contract has been fully performed on plaintiff's part and nothing remains to be done under it but the payment of money by defendant, and plaintiff elects to sue in general assumpsit instead of declaring specially on the express contract, the measure of damages will ordinarily be the rate of recompense fixed by the special contract.[52] A recovery of a larger amount than that stipulated in the special contract is not permissible.[53] Where work has been done or goods furnished under a special contract, in an action in quantum meruit based on the default of the other party, the price is governed by the stipulation, if any, in the abandoned contract.[54]

Limitation by amount laid. Plaintiff may recover less,[55] but not more,[56] damages than are laid in the declaration, and if a larger sum is awarded than claimed, a new trial should be granted, unless plaintiff remits the excess of damages,[57] as he has the right to do.[58]

Interest. It has been held that interest is due after a default to pay upon demand made, or, if no demand is made, from the commencement of the suit.[59]

ASSUMPTIO. In Latin, generally a taking, receiving, assumption; but in juridical Latin, an addition, circumstance.[1]

ASSUMPTION. It has been said that "assumption" implies knowledge,[2] imports a contract, or some kindred act of an unconstrained will,[3] and, when applied to the payment of a debt, is broader than and includes a promise and the duty to pay.[4] The word has been defined as meaning the act of assuming or taking to or upon one's self;[5] agreement of the transferee of property to pay obligations of the transferor which are chargeable on it,[6] or undertaking or adoption of a debt or obligation resting upon another;[7] also the pretension of having or possessing or the taking on in appearance but not in reality;[8]

Loss of profits by breach of contract is not recoverable under the common counts—Doyle v. Desenberg, 41 N.W 866, 74 Mich. 79.

Waiver of tort

Where plaintiff elects to waive a conversion and sue in assumpsit on the theory of implied contract, the measure of damages is the benefit which the wrongdoer has received, which is generally held to be the value of the property on the date of conversion with interest from that date—Wolfe v. Shell Petroleum Corporation, (C C A.Okl) 33 F.(2d) 438, certiorari denied 57 S.Ct. 19.

Nominal damages

In assumpsit to recover for material sold and delivered, refusal of defendant's prayers intended as demurrers to evidence was held not erroneous, where there was positive evidence that some of material had been delivered to defendant and used by him, and, even in absence of proof as to value, plaintiff would have been entitled to judgment for at least nominal damages—Cohen v. Bogatzky, 131 A. 31, 146 Md. 134—5 C J p 1411 note 45 [c].

a taking for granted;[9] hypothesis.[10] The word has been held to be substantially synonymous with, or equivalent to, "inference," "presumption," "probability,"[11] and "understanding;"[12] and has been contrasted with "concealment," "denial," and "repudiation."[13]

Assumption of risk. The term usually applies to the relation of master and servant, but may apply to other relations.[14] As applied in the master and servant relation, it is defined and distinguished from other terms, see Master and Servant §§ 357–420 [39 C.J. p 684 note 1–p 813 note 67], and, as applied to negligence see Negligence § 174 [45 C.J. p 1043 note 63–p 1044 note 77]. It has been said that while the term technically connotes a consequence of contract,[15] courts have sometimes used this term interchangeably with phrases such as "taking the risk" or "incurring the risk," and that the thought behind these phrases, as thus used, has frequently been indicated in the law by the maxim "volenti non fit injuria."[16] The term presupposes some danger,[17] a knowledge thereof,[18] a reasonable opportunity to ascertain the nature of the risk,[19] and ordinarily implies appreciation thereof,[20] and acquiescence therein;[21] and has been defined as the acquiescence of an ordinarily prudent man in a known danger, the risk of which he assumes by contract.[22] Also it has been said that the term implies the existence of a cause outside plaintiff, and that it is used with reference to fault on the part of another and as an answer to a claim that defendant is chargeable with such fault as a breach of duty owed to plaintiff.[23]

Assumption of skill. The doctrine known as the "assumption of skill" on the part of the master sometimes makes the knowledge implied against the master relative to the safety of the place of work, and the nature, constituents, and general characteristics of the things used in the business, superior to that implied against the servant, especially where the servant is inexperienced.[24]

Other phrases: "Assumption . . . of all the existing debts, liabilities, and obligations,"[25] "assumption of an obligation or liability,"[26] "assumption of liability,"[27] "assumption of marital rights, duties or obligations,"[28] "assumption of mortgage,"[29] "assumption of the mortgage debt,"[30] "assumption that the lease will be signed,"[31] "contractual assumption of risk,"[32] and "pro tanto assumption of a future

ASSURANCE. It has been said that "assurance" is a term having several distinct meanings;[35] and that the primary meaning of the word is act or declaration of assuring, or that which is designed to give confidence.[36] It has also been defined generally as a promise;[37] a representation, declaration, or persuasion,[38] also, a making secure; insurance.[39] In conveyancing, the word has been defined as a conveyance,[40] any instrument which confirms the title to real estate;[41] the legal evidence of the transfer of property.[42] In commercial law, a pledge, guaranty, or surety.[43]

Common assurance. The legal evidences of the translation of property, whereby every person's estate is assured to him, and all controversies, doubts, and difficulties are either prevented or removed.[44]

Other phrases: "Assurance of goods and chattels,[45] "assurance of lands,"[46] "assurance of safety,"[47] "assurance of title,"[48] "covenant for further assurance" see Covenants § 46 [15 C.J. p 1236 note 80–p 1237 note 4], "on the assurance,"[49] "personal assurance,"[50] and "relying upon the assurance."[51]

ASSURANTIA. Law Latin, an assurance; in common law, insurance; in conveyancing, a deed or instrument of conveyancing.[52]

ASSURARE. Law Latin, to assure; to make sure or secure; to confirm or establish; to insure; to convey.[53]

ASSURE. To make certain and put beyond doubt;[54] also, to convey.[55]

Assured

In general use, the word has been defined as meaning made certain and put beyond doubt;[56] made sure, safe, indubitable, or not doubting,[57] undoubted.[58] The word, however, has been said not to mean "absolute certainty."[59] As an insurance term, referring to the person insured, the word is defined in the title Insurance § 49 [5 C.J. p 1414 notes 27–30].

Use by insurance companies

The term was formerly of very frequent use in the modern sense of insurance, particularly in English maritime law, and still appears in the policies of some companies, but is otherwise seldom seen of late years. There seems to be a tendency, however, to use "assurance" for the contracts of life insurance companies, and "insurance" for risks upon property.—Black L. D.

§ 1. Definition and Classification

An asylum is an institution for the relief and assistance of unfortunate or afflicted persons; its status as such depends on its true nature and character and not on the name by which it is called or the motive prompting its establishment.

An asylum has been defined as an institution for the protection or relief of the unfortunate, as an asylum for the poor, for the deaf and dumb, or for the insane;[1] an institution for receiving, maintaining, and, so far as possible, ameliorating the condition of persons suffering from bodily defects, mental maladies, or other misfortunes, as an orphan asylum, an asylum for the blind, for the insane, etc.;[2] a refuge, sanctuary, or charitable institution.[3] Sometimes, from the context in which it is used, the word may be deemed as the substantial equivalent of, and be intended to denote, an institution in the nature of a hospital.[4]

When used in constitutional or legislative provisions relating to public institutions, the term has been construed as embracing all institutions, established and maintained at the public expense, for the care, education, and support of the unfortunate.[5]

If the institution is in fact of the character described, its status as an asylum is not affected by the motive prompting its erection and maintenance;[6] neither is it material whether it is called a school, a retreat, a home, a society or an asylum;[7] what is material is the nature, and not the name, of the institution.[8]

On the other hand, the fact that in some of its incidental features, such as the reception of children, an institution performs a similar service to that rendered by an asylum, does not make it one, if in its primary purpose it is different and does not operate in the manner characteristic of asylums.[9]

§ 2. Establishment, Ownership, and Maintenance

Subject to any relevant constitutional limitations, the public duty of assisting the unfortunate and afflicted may be discharged by contributing to the support of asylums maintained by other agencies or by establishing asylums whose management is confided to others as well as by their establishment and operation directly.

Unless some constitutional inhibition of such a course of conduct exists, the state may discharge its duty of assisting or maintaining the unfortunate by contributions to asylums founded or primarily maintained by its political subdivisions or by private bounty and need not establish its own asylums for that purpose.[10] The state also may establish a state asylum, entrusting the management thereof to a private corporation organized for like purposes.[11]

§ 3. —— Private Asylum

Private corporations to conduct asylums may ordinarily hold whatever property is requisite for that purpose. Constitutional provisions forbidding state aid to sectarian or private organizations ordinarily prohibit contributions of public funds toward the maintenance of private asylums, save in so far as express exception is made therefor.

Under statutes authorizing corporations to hold all property, real or personal, necessary for the purposes of their creation, a corporation may take and own the land requisite for an asylum, where the conduct of such an institution is included among its charter powers.[12]

Constitutional prohibitions of state aid to sectarian institutions or to individuals apply to render unconstitutional contributions by a state or any of its political subdivisions toward the maintenance of asylums established by, and belonging to, religious organizations or private charitable enterprise, even though grants of aid are made in connection with power given the government to commit inmates to such asylums.[13] Where an express exception is made by the constitution, however, of payments for designated purposes to particular classes of asylums, as under a provision authorizing the payment to orphan asylums of funds for the education of inmates, the state or its subdivisions may contribute to the maintenance of an asylum to the extent of, and for the purposes embraced by, such prohibition, and the asylum has a right to claim that measure of support provided by law,[14] provided, of course, the asylum has complied with the regulations imposed by the legislature as a condition of the assistance.[15] In cases falling within such exceptions and legislation enacted pursuant thereto, the contribution made by the state to the maintenance of the asylum is not a "charity" but should be considered in the light of the performance of a duty by the state to care for its citizens who are unable to care for themselves.[16]

§ 4. —— Public Asylum

a. Ownership and status
b. Establishment and maintenance

a. Ownership and Status

Public asylums are public governmental institutions; if established by the state, they are state institutions and owned by the state absolutely or subject to trusts, as the case may be, but if established by governmental subdivisions, with the state merely contributing to their maintenance, they are not.

An asylum established and maintained by the state or any of its subdivisions is unquestionably a public institution[17] and is indeed one which is strictly governmental in character.[18] Moreover, it is a state institution when it is an arm of the state, tracing its existence thereto and subserving objects which are statewide in character;[19] and this may be so although the administration of the institution is entrusted to, and a considerable part of the funds for its support are derived from, a private charitable enterprise;[20] but, where in origin and the scope of its services, it is referable to some subdivision of the state, such as a county, it is not to be deemed a state institution, even though the state is under the constitutional duty of supporting institutions of the character in question and does in fact contribute to the support of the asylum, and although the institution is subject to legislative control.[21]

The real ownership of the property occupied by a state asylum is in the state.[22] This is true, although the nominal title is in a corporation created by law to conduct the asylum, where the state is the sole member of the corporation;[23] and, unless restrained by the terms of the instruments under which the property is acquired, the legislature may require the corporation to transfer it to the state, but such conveyance would in no way alter the state's interest in the property.[24]

The nature of the state's interests in the realty depends on the deeds under which the property is held and the terms of contracts or wills by which property has been given to, and accepted for, the institution, being a fee simple title with complete and absolute control, extending even to the diversion of the property to other uses, in the absence of trusts or limitations expressed in the deeds or arising out of donations or bequests accepted for the asylum.[25]

If an act for the purchase of real estate and the erection of an asylum provides for control by a private corporation, such corporation has a mere privilege revocable by the state, and not a vested, irrevocable right; the state could not lawfully purchase the land in trust for a private corporation, and the title, both legal and equitable, is necessarily in the state.[26]

b. Establishment and Maintenance

(1) In general
(2) Support and upkeep

(1) In General

Subject to constitutional limitations, the propriety of the acts of boards or officials in connection with the location, establishment, or maintenance of public asylums is dependent on the terms of relevant statutes, whether specific or general.

Under constitutional provisions in some states, for example, where it is provided that all public institutions shall be located at the seat of government, the legislature has no discretion as to the location of state asylums, being limited to a decision whether such institutions shall be established at all and, if that decision is in the affirmative, being required to heed the constitutional injunction in the matter of their location.[27] In the absence of such provisions, the legislature has the power itself to designate a place where the institution shall be located;[28] or it may, as has commonly been done, delegate this authority to a committee or commission appointed for the purpose.[29]

A commission selected, pursuant to statute, for the establishment of a state asylum can act only as to the matters, and must act in the manner, specified in its legislative mandate, and thus, if the commission is empowered only to select a site of a described character, it has no power to purchase or to fix a price to be paid by the state for land deemed by it to be suitable for the location of the asylum; having chosen a site, its power is exhausted.[30] It is not exhausted, however, by a merely partial or incomplete location; hence, up until the time a precise tract or parcel of ground on which the asylum shall be located has been fixed on, the commission may reconsider and revoke its prior determinations, not being bound by any prior designation of the general region or community wherein the institution shall be established.[31]

Where, in addition to the power of selecting a location, the commission is expressly authorized to purchase or acquire the land selected for asylum purposes, it may, of course, bargain for and accept a deed of the premises,[32] but, in the absence of any such specific grant of power, the land selected for the purpose can be obtained only in such manner, by condemnation or otherwise, as is by statute provided for the acquisition of land by the state.[33]

Commissioners entrusted with the duty of seeing to the construction of the buildings requisite for the asylum and directed to accept the lowest responsible bid for such work are given judicial and discretionary, not merely ministerial, powers; they are not required to award the contract to the lowest bidder but are to deliberate and decide as to the responsible character of the several bidders, giving due allowance to all relevant factors and considerations bearing on the question.[34]

Where the statutes empower counties, in establishing asylums, either to purchase land and erect the requisite buildings, or to purchase land and buildings, the county may, if it elects the latter alternative, contract for such improvements in the buildings as are necessary to fit them for the purpose of an asylum.[35] They are not required, in so contracting, to submit the project to competitive public bidding in the absence of any statute so requiring, but may let it on private contract on a cost plus basis or otherwise;[36] and a statute requiring competitive bidding, where the contract is one for erection of a building or for repairs, has no application.[37]

Maintenance. Where control of state penal and charitable institutions is vested in the same board, with no distinction made between the two classes of institutions in defining the board's powers and duties, its functions with respect to the maintenance of state asylums under its control are the same, and are to be exercised in the same manner, as are those relating to penal institutions.[38]

Maintenance properly includes the making of whatever repairs and replacements are requisite for the operation of the institution,[39] the term will be viewed rather liberally as not being confined to the preservation of the asylum in its original state, but as inclusive of whatever is necessary to its reasonably efficient functioning in the light of modern knowledge, including the making of any changes in the plant which in fact relate to the proper maintenance of the institution or its inmates, although they involve a substitution of modern processes or devices unknown at the time of the establishment of the asylum.[40] Specifically, it comprehends expenses incurred for the food, clothing, and care of inmates, and for repairs to buildings and equipment;[41] but it does not comprehend the purchase of additional land, the erection of additional buildings, or the furnishing and equipment thereof.[42]

It has thus been held that authority to construct buildings at an asylum is not to be implied from the usual powers incident to its control and supervision, even though such buildings be necessary for the proper maintenance of the institution, such building expense being an extraordinary expenditure requiring a special appropriation.[43] Where such an appropriation is made with no provisions as to the erection of the building, the responsible boards or officials have implied authority to resort to any proper method for accomplishing that object,[44] but the expenditure must be made in the manner prescribed by statutes applicable to such boards or officials, where there are applicable statutes.[45]

Where the legislature authorizes the erection of additional buildings and appoints a special board to have charge thereof, the regular board will, nevertheless, be presumed to retain its power, except in so far as those powers are expressly withdrawn, and as to matters not expressly intrusted to the special board, its decision controls, for example, in the matter of the location of the proposed building, where no power as to location has been expressly given.[46]

Authority given designated county officials to erect, repair, or improve "necessary buildings" and to borrow money therefor after an election and other prescribed steps is sufficient to entitle such officials to issue bonds for the purpose of erecting or repairing the buildings necessary for a county asylum, after compliance with all procedural requisites, although such institution is not specifically named.[47]

(2) Support and Upkeep

Subject to such constitutional limitations as may exist, a state asylum may be supported either by general taxation throughout the state as a whole, or by allocation of a part or the whole of the costs among political subdivisions or to the inmates of the asylum, in the legislative discretion.

It is within the power of the legislature to take charge of, and provide for, the indigent, insane, and feeble-minded persons within its boundaries by general taxation, and to relieve the several counties from such burden, except as they bear their proportion through such taxation.[48]

The mere fact that the asylum is owned and controlled by the state does not, necessarily, make its maintenance and the maintenance of its inmates a state charge, however,[49] and it is equally within the

Contract with lowest responsible bidder

If the board in charge of a state asylum is required to contract for the erection of buildings by letting the work to the lowest responsible bidder, it must pursue that method but need not let a single contract for the entire construction, being at liberty to award several contracts for the several portions of the work — State ex rel Collins v Halladay, (S D.) 252 N W. 733.

power of the legislature to require each county to maintain its own indigent persons, or to reimburse the state in whole or in part for so doing.[50] The fact that the institution is a state institution in no manner restricts or limits the legislature in the exercise of such power;[51] and statutes requiring the counties from which inmates have been admitted, or the inmates themselves, if financially able, to contribute to the maintenance of such inmates in state asylums are not obnoxious to constitutional provisions providing that such institutions shall be supported by the state,[52] confiding to local authorities the control of local taxation or fiscal affairs,[53] or forbidding double taxation.[54]

It is within the discretion of the legislature whether the counties shall be required to pay such sum as may reimburse the state or to pay a fixed sum which shall be less than the total proportional share of the upkeep of the inmates;[55] and, when payment of a fixed sum is required, it is no objection to the validity of the provision that any unexpended surplus of such fund is directed to be covered into the general maintenance fund of the asylum.[56] The amount required to be paid is a matter within the legislative discretion, which will not be disturbed unless clearly unreasonable.[57] It is no defense to the liability of a county that the institution has sufficient money in its maintenance fund derived from the state appropriation, or from such fund plus voluntary payments by other counties and by individuals.[58]

The determination in the first instance as to the county of the inmate's residence, which is, accordingly, chargeable for his upkeep, may appropriately be confided to the board in charge of the institution, the right to a review by the courts being duly preserved.[59]

Where certain designated supplies are required to be furnished at the expense of the inmates personally, the obligation is a continuing one relating to the whole duration of the stay in the asylum and not merely to conditions at the time of admittance.[60] Before an individual will be held to answer for any of the charges of maintaining an inmate in an asylum, however, there must be a clear statutory declaration establishing such liability.[61]

§ 5. Regulation and Supervision

a. In general
b. Investigation
c. Audit and allowance of claims

a. In General

The power of regulating asylums, public or private, resides in the legislature, subject always to the requirement that the regulations may not be unconstitutional or unreasonable, and, under it, in the boards chosen to have charge of the institutions, in so far as they are authorized to act by the statutes conferring their authority.

As to state asylums, the legislature may enact any regulations with respect to their control and management not in conflict with constitutional provisions.[62] Where a state, by a general and comprehensive act, sets up a system of caring for a particular class of citizens in asylums and, by later statutes, authorizes the establishment of additional asylums which refer to the basic act for all matters, except the construction of buildings, the general act is controlling on questions concerning the government of such institutions, regulations for the admission and discharge of inmates, etc.[63]

Moreover, under the police power, the legislative authority of the state or of its political subdivisions may regulate the establishment and operation of private asylums,[64] but any such regulation, to be valid, must be reasonable.[65] While the state may properly require the procuring of a license for the conduct of such an institution and make its issuance discretionary with the licensing board,[66] it cannot, on the pre-

Chiropractic license no substitute
A duly qualified chiropractor is subject to a statute requiring a license by the state health board be-text of regulation, prohibit either directly or indirectly the business of operating a private asylum, which is a lawful one,[67] nor can it make or enforce unreasonable or arbitrary requirements as to the construction or location of such institutions or the classification and character of inmates admitted.[68]

The board of managers of such an asylum also has power to make all necessary by-laws and regulations, not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of a state or the United States, for the government of such institutions, officers, employees, and inmates,[69] and such board, rather than the executive officers employed by it for the day-to-day operation of the institution, is responsible for, and in control of, the policies and general administration of the asylum.[70] The board in charge of a public asylum cannot, however, confer upon itself power for the transaction of any business not confided to it by the statutes establishing it.[71]

The courts will not undertake to prescribe rules for the government of institutions of this character or to interfere with those made by the duly constituted authorities, except when the latter are unreasonable and subversive of the purposes for which such institutions are established and maintained,[72] and this is true even as to inmates committed to the institution by court order.[73] Also, the governor of the state may not, as such, or as ex officio head of the board, ignore or override the regulations duly made.[74]

b. Investigation

Authority to direct the investigation of asylums resides in the legislature.

The power to order an investigation of the handling of the affairs of a public asylum by the employees in charge thereof rests with the legislature alone; it may not be undertaken at will by private individuals.[75] Moreover, when an investigation is being made by a private individual, the board in charge of the institution may prescribe reasonable regulations conditioning access to the records and plant and communications with employees and inmates, in order that the records or property may not be disturbed or the orderly operation of the asylum interfered with.[76]

Even as to asylums operated by private corporations, the legislature has the power to direct an investigation of their affairs, financial or otherwise, at least in so far as is necessary to protect any interest the state may have in the institution, and to appoint a commission for that purpose;[77] the power of commissioners appointed for that purpose is quasi-judicial and wholly discretionary, and if, in their judgment, the situation requires the sequestration of the records and funds of the asylum, that decision will not be interfered with, in the absence of an abuse of discretion.[78]

A visiting committee appointed, pursuant to statute, to inspect state asylums does not, by reason of its being empowered to examine witnesses under oath, have the further power to punish for contempts, that power not being expressly given and not arising by implication from the power which is given.[79]

c. Audit and Allowance of Claims

When, and as, directed by statute, the state auditor is to examine into the fiscal affairs of state asylums and issue warrants in discharge of claims.

Where expenditures are intrusted to the good faith and official responsibility of the asylum managers, the state auditor is not required to examine into the legality of the bills incurred by such managers before drawing his warrant for the amounts claimed.[80]

Where, however, the auditor is required by statute to audit all vouchers for expenditures which appear to be for lawful purposes, the necessary implication is that he shall not audit claims for unlawful expenditures, and this without regard to the motives or good faith of the officers by whom the expenditures were made.[81]

Under a statute allowing the auditor to issue warrants for only the amount of debts and liabilities existing, a warrant can legally be issued only after the expense or liability is actually incurred;[82] and if an appropriation is to be diminished by an unexfore he can maintain an asylum or sanitarium, no exception having been established by the statute as to licensed physicians or chiropractors—Diepenbrock v. State Board of Health, 135 A. 531, 82 N.H. 451

pended balance, the auditor may determine by any competent means, either by reports of officers or otherwise, what that balance is.[83]

§ 6. Officers

a. Status, employment, and tenure
b. Bonds

a. Status, Employment, and Tenure

The status of asylum officers, and all questions as to appointment, tenure, and removal or other termination of employment, are determined by an application of the rules applicable to other officers generally, and of relevant statutes construed in the light of such rules.

The status of a particular person as officer or employee is to be determined by the tests governing in that connection generally, which are stated in Officers § 5 [46 C.J. p 928 note 91–p 932 note 34], including the manner of creation of the position and the nature of the duties attached.[84]

Officers appointable by the board having charge of asylums can only be appointed by action of the board duly constituted and acting as such, and not on the authority of a majority of the board members acting individually in concurring in the appointment.[85] A constitutionally prescribed mode for selecting the officers of state institutions need not be pursued in choosing the officials of asylums, even those publicly maintained, which are not strictly state institutions.[86]

In the absence of any specification in the constitution, the power of fixing the terms of officials of public asylums is vested in the legislature.[87] Where prior statutes governing state asylums and fixing a specified term for official appointments are superseded by a code completely covering the affairs of such institutions, which contains no such specification, the offices in question are of indefinite tenure, despite the absence of any provisions to that effect in the new code, and appointees are subject to the general rules respecting the duration and termination of appointments to offices of that character;[88] and, of course, as to matters respecting tenure and removal wherein a later statute contains provisions necessarily inconsistent with a prior one, the earlier statute is repealed.[89]

Filling vacancies. A vacancy occurring in any of the offices connected with the administration of state asylums, whether by failure to designate a successor to the incumbent in office or otherwise is to be filled by appointment by the official or board vested by the constitution or by statute with the power of appointment generally,[90] or under the particular state of facts which is involved, if it is specifically dealt with.[91] Such interim appointment is not necessarily for the full term attached to the office or even for the full balance of the unexpired term to fill which the appointment is made, but is only for such time as the relevant statutes prescribe.[92] While the boards or officials authorized to appoint officers of asylums may make such appointments for the statutory term, even though they should in part extend beyond the period of their own incumbency,[93] they cannot make appointments to commence in the future after their own terms of office expire, in the absence of any necessity for so doing.[94]

Termination of employment. Where the board in charge of a public asylum is authorized to elect to a particular office for a stated term, the implication is that the person elected is not to be removed by it during the term prescribed,[95] and this implication is strengthened by the existence of other statutes giving it the power to discharge other employees and those providing a method for removal of officers generally.[96] So, too, where authorized to remove the officer for specified causes, he is not removable at the board's pleasure but only on the establishment of a specified cause.[97] On the other hand, where the statute provides for appointment by a given authority and is totally silent as to removal, or where it expressly authorizes removal at the pleasure of the appointing authority, the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment, and the appointing authority may remove at will,[98] and this, even though, at the time the employment commenced, the officer and the appointing authority entered into a contract of employment for a stated term.[99] A statutory provision that asylum officers are to be removed only for cause and after a hearing must yield to a constitutional provision that officers not holding for a fixed term are removable at the pleasure of the appointing authority, so that one appointed by the board in charge of such institutions to an office having no stated term may be removed therefrom for such reasons and in such manner as the board thinks fit.[1] Although the statute prescribes a term not in excess of a fixed period and that the officer shall only be removable for cause, if the employment is under an express contract for a stated term less than that mentioned by the statute, the officer cannot complain of being superseded by another after expiration of the contractual time but before expiration of the statutory period.[2]

Where an officer of an institution holds not merely at pleasure, but during good behavior or subject to removal for specified causes, then, it has been held, he can only be removed on the specified grounds, and, before such removal, there must be notice and a hearing given to him.[3] Moreover, after charges have been preferred and acted on favorably to the officer, they cannot be reopened and reconsidered without further notice,[4] but there is some early authority to the effect that the discretion of the appointing authority as to the existence of cause for removal is uncontrollable and, hence, no reason need be assigned or proceedings had, the general effect being just as if he were removable at pleasure.[5] Of course, where a power of summary removal is expressly conferred by statute, its exercise in a given case cannot be inquired into or questioned by the courts.[6]

Revocation of a valid election or appointment finally made is the equivalent of a removal from office, within the meaning and application of the rules here set forth;[7] and so is the appointment of a successor to an office already occupied at the time of the appointment.[8]

One employed as superintendent of a private asylum under a contract for a fixed period is not entitled to demand full compliance therewith at all hazards but may be discharged by those employing him for good cause, such as gross immorality, theft, embezzlement, or other criminal conduct rendering him unfaithful or unfit for the performance of his duties; they have the right, and indeed are under the duty, of examining into such matters and where, after such investigation, they reach a decision, which is warranted by the facts and not merely arbitrary, that such cause for discharge exists, they may remove him.[9]

b. Bonds

Recovery on bonds, commonly required of officers of public asylums, must be predicated on some breach of duty by the bonded officer.

In a number of jurisdictions, the giving of a bond by the officers, or by designated officers, of public asylums, is required by virtue of statutory requirements, some of which have received judicial interpretation.[10] No recovery can be had on such a bond unless a breach of official duty by the bonded officer is affirmatively shown, and so, neither the sureties nor the superintendent can be held responsible for breaches of duty by the trustees.[11]

§ 7. Inmates

The board in charge of an asylum may make and enforce suitable regulations governing the admission and discharge of inmates and their conduct and privileges while in the asylum except that it may not retain against his will one voluntarily admitted.

Where a public asylum is established for the reception of a designated class of persons, any person of the class therein named is eligible for admission; and, in the absence of explicit legislation on the subject, it is for those to whom control of the institution is committed to determine whether any particular person comes within such class and to fix the method by which such determination shall be made.[12]

An inmate may properly be expelled from the institution for conduct prohibited by the by-laws under penalty of dismissal, at least where such by-laws are reasonable.[13] Such dismissal may not, however, be ordered by the administrative agent in charge of the asylum solely on his own authority, but only with the concurrence or assent of the corporate or governmental board having the government and control of the institution,[14] nor may it be ordered without affording the inmate notice and an opportunity to be heard;[15] but admission to an asylum does not create any valuable vested right, and it has been held that a person so admitted may be expelled by vote of the board, on the ground of insubordination, without notice or hearing, where there is no provision either in the statutes or the by-laws specifying the grounds for expulsion, and the whole matter is thus confided to the discretion of the board.[16]

A rule that inmates are, so far as dismissal is concerned, to be entirely subject to persons in loco parentis and subject to discharge only at the direction of such persons and not at their own volition has been sustained as reasonable and salutary;[17] and no legal wrong can be predicated on the apprehension and return of one who has escaped or departed from the institution without such an order for discharge.[18]

There is, however, one exception to the rule that the board may fix and enforce regulations for the detention or dismissal of inmates, springing from the principle that no man can, by agreement, lose his liberty, and that is the situation where an inmate enters under a voluntary agreement to remain for a fixed time, in which case the managers of an asylum cannot compel compliance with the agreement, even though the regulations of the asylum require the signing of such agreement by all persons seeking admittance voluntarily.[19]

Where the right of the inmate is made dependent on residence, it depends on residence at the time of commitment, and hence an infant duly committed is not to be discharged merely because of the removal of his parents from the state.[20]

Inmates have no right to receive or confer with visitors at a time or in a place or manner contrary to the regulations on that subject established by those in charge of the asylum.[21]

§ 8. Management

In anything within the scope of the authority, usually quite broad, which is conferred upon them, the boards or officials in charge of asylums have the power of management or control; but not as to matters not entrusted to them or expressly withheld from them.

The usual, and, indeed, practically universal, practice is for the legislature to confide the management of state asylums to designated boards or officials.[22] Where that is done, such boards or officials have a complete and unlimited discretion with respect to the management and control of such institutions, subject only to whatever express directions may be given them by statute and to the requirement that any rules made by them shall be reasonable.[23] The presumption of regularity is extended to the acts of boards or officials in charge of the conduct and management of asylums when acting in fulfilment of the duties confided to them, and their action cannot be assailed for irregularity unless the same is established.[24]

Of course, where the statutes command the doing of particular acts by those having charge of asylums, leaving them in such particulars no discretion but only the duty of acting ministerially, the expression of the legislative will prevails and the officials in question must do what is thus prescribed.[25] The repeal of an act prescribing certain conduct on the part of the responsible official in charge of an asylum and its replacement by another giving a large discretion absolves him from the duty of performance of the specific acts required under the former statute.[26]

While the board may secure expert assistants, and invest them with considerable duties in carrying out the various enterprises connected with the asylums under its care, it cannot surrender to such assistants its responsibilities of management, but must itself actively and actually assume the actual direction of affairs.[27]

Ordinarily, the purposes for which the sums appropriated for the support of public asylums shall be expended is a matter wholly within the jurisdiction of the board if there is no express legislative direction on that score[28] However, money which has been appropriated by the legislature for certain named purposes cannot be diverted by the authorities of the institutions from these purposes,[29] nor have they power to obligate the state to pay for services for which they had no authority to contract.[30] Furthermore, they have no authority to borrow money or contract debts beyond the appropriations made by the legislature for the support and operation of their respective institutions.[31]

It is a proper exercise of discretion to provide that the asylum shall not receive more inmates than there are adequate facilities to accommodate,[32] and further, to provide a plan of allotment among the several subdivisions of the state in a fair and equitable manner, in case there are not facilities to care for all.[33] The officials in charge need not receive inmates up to the utmost physical capacity of the asylum, if to do so would in their judgment be detrimental to those admitted[34]

Boards or officials authorized to execute conveyances of or affecting asylum property ordinarily have power to give or withhold their assent to the terms of a proposed conveyance so to exact such qualifications or restrictions on the grant as, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, they deem proper; but once having acted affirmatively on a proposed conveyance, their power is exhausted, and they cannot thereafter modify or alter the terms of the conveyance without further authorization.[35]

Although the management of an asylum, established by the state is confided by the legislation establishing it to a private eleemosynary corporation, the legislature may by subsequent action withdraw the management from such corporation and place the institution directly under the control of state employees or officials.[36]

§ 9. Liabilities of Proprietors, Officers and Employees

Liability attaches to asylums in contract or tort on the same grounds as to other public corporations or governmental instrumentalities, and to their officers or employees for their own acts personally chargeable to them, which give right to a cause of action; neither may be held to answer under the doctrine of respondeat superior.

A public asylum may, through its officers, make contracts for supplies for its inmates and incur liabilities on that account, just as for the proper maintenance of the institution it may sue for debts due it, or to enforce any right allowed by law;[37] and, even as to contracts in excess of authority, it may be answerable in quantum meruit for goods and services received to the use and benefit of the asylum[38] It may, likewise, incur liability in damages for creating and maintaining public nuisances which endanger human life, or destroy or injure the land of another, and may be sued to enforce such liability.[39]

However, such an institution being a mere instrumentality of the state government, brought into being to aid in the performance of governmental duty, the rule of respondeat superior does not apply to it;[40] and, therefore, it cannot be made to respond in damages for a personal injury inflicted on another by one of its inmates or employees,[41] although such injury results from negligence or mali-

County asylums

Under a statute authorizing county asylums providing for state assistance thereto, creating a board of trustees appointable by the governor, and declaring inter alia that the board of supervisors of any county taking advantage of the statute should be under the duty of appropriating such funds "as may be necessary for improvement of the grounds and buildings . . . such appropriation . . . (to) be paid . . . on the order of said board of trustees," while the county board of supervisors has the right to determine whether any, and how much, money should be appropriated for improvements, the board of trustees provided by the statute, and not the supervisors, is empowered to select the improvements to be made and to contract therefor and to control the making of the improvements and the related expenditures—Milwaukee County v Paul, 18 N.W. 321, 322, 59 Wis 341.

Execution sales

While it would not be lawful to levy upon and sell property of an asylum indispensable to its operation and the maintenance of the inmates, other property, not clearly appearing to possess that quality, is subject to execution for the purpose of enforcing judgments against such an institution for injury to the property of others—Hauns v. cious acts on the part of such inmate or employee,[42] and although the statute creating it provides that it may sue and be sued.[43] The liability for such acts is on the individual personally guilty of the negligence or misconduct causing the injury.[44] This has been held alike as to injuries sustained by an inmate through the negligence or wrongdoing of its employees[45] as to injuries to third persons by reason of negligent or wilful misconduct of employees or of inmates,[46] and as to injuries done employees by inmates.[47]

Moreover, acquiescence or other matters which would constitute a defense were the liability claimed against a private individual are available by way of defense to an asylum against which a similar liability is asserted.[48]

While an officer cannot be held liable for any mistake made when acting in a judicial or quasi-judicial capacity,[49] and thus is not liable on the doctrine of respondeat superior for personal injuries occasioned by an employee appointed by him,[50] this rule does not apply to ministerial acts in excess of authority.[51] Hence, such an officer is liable to an inmate for money taken from the person of the latter at the time of his admission and delivered to a third person presenting an adverse claim to it, not being protected in such action by a regulation authorizing delivery of effects taken from inmates to persons interested in them and looking after their welfare.[52] Such an official will be personally liable for his own conduct in the event he improperly restrains in the asylum one not duly committed,[53] but he may not be held to answer in damages for merely performing the duties confided to him in a lawful and proper manner, even though that involves a wrongful imprisonment.[54] An officer who without legislative authority borrows money, even though it is intended for, and devoted to, asylum purposes, is personally liable therefor.[55]

There is no liability for breach of contract imposed on the board by reason of the discharge of an employee or officer before the expiration of the time stipulated by his contract of employment, where the board, in so acting, was within the authority conferred upon it with reference to removals,[56] nor by reason of the appointment of another to succeed an incumbent holding over beyond the expiration of the term fixed by his contract, under circumstances negativing the existence of an implied contract of reemployment for a like term in the future.[57] A failure to resort to physical force or court procedure to oust him from the possession or premises of the asylum does not estop the board from denying liability for breach of contract;[58] in fact, it has a claim against him for the reasonable value of his upkeep for the time he wrongfully remains in possession, enforceable by set-off against arrears of salary unpaid at the time of his discharge or by any other lawful means.[59]

Allowing inmate of asylum to go at large

Where there is no provision requiring lunatics to be confined on the grounds of the asylum, it is not negligence per se for the officers of a lunatic asylum to allow an inmate to go at large, if under restraint.—Clough v. Worsham, 74 S.W. 350, 32 Tex.Civ.App. 187.

Release of inmate

Good faith as subject of inquiry

The good faith of the superintendent of a state insane asylum, who exercised his discretionary authority or a quasi-judicial nature in releasing an inmate, cannot be questioned in an action for death caused by such inmate, even under the charge that the superintendent acted maliciously, or disregarded the rights of the public.—Cappel v. § 10. Actions

Asylums may sue and be sued if the legislature assents, the suits to be brought in such manner as the statutes prescribe or, if none is prescribed, in the ordinary appropriate actions.

A state asylum being merely an agency or instrumentality of the state, may be sued with the consent of the legislature, express or implied;[60] but, in the absence of consent, a judgment against such an institution is not binding on, or conclusive against, the state.[61]

Enforceable claims, contractual or otherwise, against the board of trustees of an asylum, which is constituted a corporation with power to sue and be sued, may be recovered by action in the same manner as any other claim against a corporation.[62] Where a statutory method for obtaining reimbursement of outlays for inmates, made by the state but chargeable to the inmates or others, is provided, the remedy thus indicated by the legislature must be pursued.[63]

In General

A preposition[1] of extremely various use,[2] to which lexicographers have given many definitions and shades of meaning.[3] It is a word of great relativity and elasticity of meaning[4] and is somewhat indefinite,[5] shaping itself easily to varying contexts and circumstances,[6] and taking its color from the circumstances and situation[7] under which it is necessary to apply it to surrounding objects.[8] Aside from its context, it is not a word of precise and accurate meaning, or of clean, clear-cut definition,[9] and it has been said that the connection furnishes the best definition.[10] Primarily, "at" denotes simple occupancy of a point in space, whence arise numerous allied and figurative meanings, as of time, direction, etc, by which the word partakes of the meanings of numerous other prepositions and prepositional phrases[11] In its various senses, hereinafter discussed, the word may be expressive of exactness or precision, or it may be used to express the idea of approximation or nearness Primarily, "at" is said to have much the sense of "to," without implication, in itself, of motion,[12] but, being less restricted as to relative position than other prepositions, it may in different constructions assume their office,[13] and so become equivalent, according to the context, to "about."[14] "by,"[15] "close to,"[16] "coexistent with,"[17] "from," "over," "through," "toward," "under,"[18] "if,"[19] "in,"[20] "in or near,"[21] "into,"[22] "near,"[23] "near approach,"[24] "near to,"[25] "on,"[26] "within,"[27] and "within the limits of."[28] much wider meaning[61] and usually negativing the idea that precision[62] or an exact coincidence[63] is intended. As distinguished from a mere geographical point, the word is often used to denote space,[64] and so used has in general an inclusive,[65] and not an exclusive,[66] signification. When used inclusively it does not mean "without" or "at the utmost verge of;"[67] but, where the context requires, it may be construed as excluding the place named,[68] and to mean just outside,[69] or within a convenient[70] or reasonable[71] distance from the named place, as, just outside a gate, door, or other barrier,[72] in both cases excluding the meaning of "inside."

At sea. The term may have different meanings according to the connection in which it is used.[73] As a phrase expressive of circumstance or condition, "at sea" is defined infra. As a phrase of place, the term has been defined as meaning out of the limits of our ports, or harbours, extra fauces terrae, vel portus.[74] As applied to persons, "at sea" is a term of rather elastic meaning, including persons in actual sea service whether in port[75] or in arms of the sea where the tide ebbs and flows.[76] Under particular circumstances, it has been held that the term includes a river or canal communicating with the ocean,[77] and that it does not include the open roadstead.[78]

The phrase occurs in connection with other words, as follows: "Any mariner or seaman, being at sea,"[79] "by a mariner, while at sea,"[80] "offences . . . punishable when committed at sea,"[81] and "services performed at sea."[82]

Other phrases: "At a courthouse,"[83] "at all intersections,"[84] "at all or any port or place on the coast of,"[85] "at anchor" (see Anchor 3 C.J.S. p. 1065 note 1), "at and from,"[86] "at an office or banking-house,"[87] "at any crossing,"[88] "at any intersection,"[89] "at any point,"[90] "at any tax sale,"[91] "at a point,"[92] "at a private residence,"[93] "at a public bathing

Time

As a preposition of time, the word is said to indicate a considerable latitude,[70] to denote closeness and proximity to the time named,[71] and to express the relation of nearness[72] and presence[73] in time. It has been held that the use of the word usually negatives the idea that precision or an exact coincidence of time is intended;[74] that it does not necessarily mean "eo instanti,"[75] or "punctum temporis,"[76] or the identical time named, or even a fixed, definite moment,[77] nor necessarily the exact moment or day;[78] but that it may mean within a reasonable time before[79] or after[80] the event contemplated, or a time near, or about, the time named.[81] The word, however, may refer to a point of time rather than to a period,[82] and, when so used in common speech, may mean the exact day,[83] the exact moment,[84] upon the stroke of,[85] being used in the sense of "at the time of," not "before,"[86] and denoting simultaneousness, as distinguished from subsequence or priority.[87] In line with the foregoing observations, and depending upon the context, "at" has been variously defined as meaning after,[88] coexistent with;[89] during,[90] from and after;[91] on occasion of; on the happening of;[92] the instant that,[93] until;[94] upon;[95] upon the coming of;[96] up to.[97] Also, the word may indicate the limits of a period of time,[98] and be taken as a word of enlargement, permission, and privilege, in the sense of "even at," or "as early as."[99] Sometimes it is used to mark the commencement of a period in the sense of "after,"[1] "as soon after as may be required by the custom of a particular business,"[2] "at or after,"[3] "beginning at,"[4] "forthwith" or "immediately,"[5] "from,"[6] "not before,"[7] "so immediately that the object sought by the notice can be attained,"[8] or "within a reasonable time thereafter."[9] At other times "at" is used to mark the close of a period,[10] in the sense of "at or before,"[11] "before,"[12] "ending at,"[13] or "until."[14] Under other circumstances "at" may be used to refer to an entire period,[15] including both its commencement and close;[16] or to a period between two indicated times, in the sense of "during;"[17] or to a period taken as a point, in the sense of "in;"[18] or to an indefinite period, without indicating either commencement or close, in the sense of "from time to time,"[19] It has also been construed to refer to one and the same continuous transaction, including all its parts, without reference to the time when the parts occurred.[20]

At any time. A relative and flexible term, not susceptible of a precise definition. It has been said that its intendment in a particular case necessarily depends upon the context and the attending circumstances;[21] and under the particular circumstances, it has been defined as meaning immediately or at once,[22] also, a reasonable time,[23] implying an in-at any time recover,"[52] and "upon due proof, at any time, . . . must make an order."[53]

At once. An adverbial phrase, sometimes almost literally construed,[54] importing immediate action,[55] but having reference to what is possible[56] or reasonable[57] under the circumstances. As commonly used, it has been said to signify all reasonable haste, as distinguished from in a reasonable time,[58] although, in distinguishing it from other words or phrases importing immediate or instantaneous action, courts have declared without qualification that it signified in a reasonable time.[59] The phrase has been variously defined as meaning as promptly as the circumstances will permit;[60] as soon as possible;[61] as soon as, under the circumstances, an act can be done;[62] at one and the same time;[63] directly, simultaneously, without delay, or at the same point of time;[64] forthwith;[65] immediately;[66] immediately and without delay;[67] presently, or without any substantial interval;[68] promptly;[69] today;[70] with greater celerity than is ordinarily comprehended by a reasonable time;[71] within such reasonable time as shall be required under all the circumstances for doing the particular thing,[72] with no delay, no postponement.[73] In particular connections, it has been said that the phrase has been construed by a majority of the courts as signifying time and not causation,[74] and, under particular circumstances, it has been held to imply a preparedness to act with the promptness required by the phrase.[75] This phrase also occurs with other words in phrases which have received judicial construction, such as: "At once after adjournment,"[76] "at once as ready,"[77] "at once elect to buy,"[78] "at once remit,"[79] "at once to terminate the employment,"[80] "beginning at once,"[81] "closed at once,"[82] "delivery . . . at once,"[83] "failure to give notice at once,"[84] "notice or proof of death . . . at once,"[85] "proceed . . . at once against the undersigned,"[86] "render at once notice . . . of such sickness,"[87] "return the goods at once,"[88] "shall at once certify,"[89] "ship at once,"[90] "transfer it at once,"[91] and "wages shall be paid at once"[92]

At the expiration of. A phrase held to define a limit of time,[93] marking either the close[94] or the beginning[95] of a period It is sometimes used to denote a fixed and definite time,[96] at other times to denote a reasonable time before[97] or after[98] the expiration of the period. The phrase has been defined as meaning after the expiration of;[99] at or after;[1] at or before;[2] and not sooner than.[3] This phrase also forms part of other phrases, such as "A lease terminable 'at the expiration of one year,'"[4] "at the expiration of five months,"[5] "at the expiration of his sentence,"[6] "at the expiration of their terms,"[7] "at the expiration of the term of this lease,"[8] "at the expiration of three days,"[9] "at the expiration of three months,"[10] "at the expiration of three years,"[11] and "at the expiration of twelve calendar months."[12]

At the time. As sometimes used, the phrase has been held to mean at the moment;[13] forthwith; immediately;[14] denoting coincidence of time.[15] So used, the phrase may refer to the moment of happening or the moment before,[16] implying prompt, vigorous action without any delay;[17] but it is not always rigidly construed to mean "eo instante,"[18] and may include a convenient time under the circumstances,[19] within reasonable limits,[20] or, more strictly, within a time so immediate that the object can be attained.[21] "At the time" may signify a period of time, as distinguished from a point of time.[22] Used in this sense, the phrase refers to an entire transaction[23] covering the whole time,[24] and every part of it,[25] and includes all that occurred,[26] or all the steps taken[27] during the period.

With other words, it occurs in phrases which have been judicially construed, such as: "At the time of emptying such cask,"[28] "at the time of her death,"[29] "at the time of sale,"[30] "at the time of the death of the husband,"[31] "at the time of the desertion,"[32] "at the time of the execution of the deed,"[33] "at the time of the happening,"[34] "at the time of the injury,"[35] "at the time of the injury and death,"[36] "at the time of the levy,"[37] "at the time of the passage of this act,"[38] "at the time of the trial,"[39] "at the time ordered by the town,"[40] "at the time recovered,"[41] "at the time seized in fee simple,"[42] "at the time the accident happened,"[43] "at the time the debt was created,"[44] "at the time the material is delivered,"[45] "at the time the truck struck plaintiff,"[46] "at the time to satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds,"[47] "at the time (when descent is cast) be a bona fide resident of the United States,"[48] and "living in adultery at the time of her husband's death."[49]

Other phrases. "At a certain day,"[50] "at a fixed or determinable future time,"[51] "at all other times,"[52] "at all times,"[53] "at any and all times,"[54] "at any stage of the cause,"[55] "at a port,"[56] "at a proper time,"[57] "at a time,"[58] "at 5.22 A. Circumstance, Condition, or Mode

It has been said that "at" is a preposition of circumstantial position, state, condition, manner, environment, etc., in a great variety of relations developed from the local sense.[3] When so used, the word denotes adjunction or conjunction, association or consociation, connection,[4] and has been defined as meaning connected with;[5] in a state or condition of;[6] object or end directed toward.[7]

At arm's length. Beyond the reach of personal influence or control.[8]

At bar. Before the court, as in the phrase, "the case at bar."[9]

At large. Not limited to any particular matter, point, or question; not under physical restraint,[10] without restraint or confinement.[11] In another sense, openly;[12] not limited to any particular place, district, person, matter, or question.[13]

The phrase forms part of other phrases which have received judicial construction, such as: "At large and not concealed,"[14] "corporation at large,"[15] "elected by the State at large,"[16] "going at large,"[17] "insane persons found at large,"[18] "prohibited from running at large,"[19] "running at large" (see Animals § 130), and "to go at large."[20]

At law. According to law; by, for, or in law.[21] The term refers generally to the American system of jurisprudence, whether legal or equitable,[22] as in the phrases: "At law and in equity,"[23] "remedy at law,"[24] and "valid at law."[25]

At right angles. Directly across,[26] as in the phrase: "Drill at right angles."[27] In a nautical sense, abeam.[28]

At sea. As an expression of place, the phrase has been defined supra. As expressive of circumstance or condition, it has been defined as in the prosecution of a voyage or passage;[29] on a ship's voyage, and pursuing the business of it;[30] open to the hazard of a sea voyage;[31] prosecuting her voyage to her port of final destination;[32] sailing.[33] It has been held that "on a passage"[34] or "on a voyage"[35] are equivalent terms; and that "arrival in port" (see Arrival 6 C.J.S. p 715 note 45) or "being in port"[36] are terms in opposition.

Other phrases. "At a good speed,"[37] "at anchor" (see Anchor 3 C.J.S. p 1065 note 1), "at command,"[38] "at complainant's costs,"[39] "at consignee's risk,"[40] "at his death,"[41] "at his option,"[42] "at his own

Formality implied

Parties are said to deal "at arm's length" when each stands upon the strict letter of his rights, and conducts the business in a formal manner, without trusting to the other's fairness or integrity, and without being subject to the other's control or overmastering influence—Black L. D.

Degree, Number, or Value

In this sense, "at" has been defined as meaning point or position in a series or scale; relative order, degree, rate, or value.[67]

At least. An adverbial phrase meaning at the lowest estimate; at the smallest concession or claim; in the smallest or lowest degree, at the smallest number;[68] and sometimes used in the sense of clearly.[69] It is a phrase of emphasis, expressive of a minimum,[70] and implies the possibility of more.[71] It imports uncertainty,[72] taking its meaning from the context,[73] and hence, under particular circumstances, has been held equivalent to "at most,"[74] "at the least,"[75] "fully,"[76] "not less than,"[77] and "not to exceed."[78] In a particular connection, it has been said that the phrase is a deprecatory rather than an inflammatory expletive, and that it does not amount to an intimation of opinion as to the guilt of accused on the part of the presiding judge.[79]

This phrase also forms part of other phrases which have received judicial construction, such as: "At least five feet high,"[80] "at least five relations,"[81] "at

40. A maxim meaning "A wrong is considered atrocious, according to the place where, the time when, or the person against whom it is committed."—Adams Gloss.

from the Latin term "attingo," and more immediately from the French "attacher."[41] It has been defined as meaning to annex;[42] to bind, fasten, or tie;[43] to connect with;[44] also, in a somewhat different sense, to seize, take, take actual possession of, or to touch;[45] to take, seize, or lay hold on by moral force, as by affection or interest; fasten or bind by moral influence.[46] In a technical sense, the word has been defined as meaning to take or apprehend by commandment of a writ or precept commonly called an attachment.[47] As distinguished from the narrow signification indicating a seizure on mesne process, discussed in the title Attachment, the word "attach" has a broad, recognized meaning and indicates any seizure of property for the purpose of bringing it within the custody of the court.[48]

Attached

A term describing the physical union of two otherwise independent structures or objects, or the relation between two parts of a single structure, each having its own function.[49] The word has been variously defined;[50] and its meaning necessarily varies as applied to attachment proceedings,[51] crops,[52] exemptions or homestead rights,[53] school districts,[54] or the annexation of territory.[55] In its most commonly accepted meaning it embodies the idea of annexation, connection,[56] or the taking into possession;[57] and has been defined as meaning adjacent;[58] annexed;[59] connected with;[60] and joined to;[61] also in another sense, having regard and affection for.[62] In a technical sense, the word has been defined as meaning held on mesne process.[63] As used in particular connections, "attached" may imply an acquisition of title to property,[64] or the initiation by proper proceedings of an inchoate right in land;[65] or it may convey the conception of possibility of removal[66] or of detachment[67] as well as of union; and is properly used to describe the relation between and function of the separate parts of a structure.[68] Also, in a particular context, the word may have reference to a fixed time.[69]

Attaching

The present participle of the verb "attach," sometimes used adjectively, as in the phrase: "Attaching creditor."[85]

ATTACHÉ. In international law, one attached to the suite of an ambassador, or a person attached to a foreign legation,[86] who, under particular circumstances, has been held to be a diplomatic official;[87] and also anyone recognized as a necessary adjunct to a court, tribunal, or office.[88]

ATTACHIAMENTA. Law Latin, attachment.[93]

ATTACHIAMENTUM. Law Latin, an attachment.[94]

ATTACHMENT. In a popular sense, it has been defined as meaning close adherence or affection; fidelity; regard; any passion or affection that binds a person.[95] It has been said that it is a stronger word than "well disposed," and, in a particular connection, implies depth of conviction.[96] Used in a mechanical sense, it has been defined as meaning something attached; some adjunct attached to an instrument, machine, or other object.[97] As technically used, signifying a seizure of property and bringing it into the custody of the court, the word is defined and the subject matter fully treated in the title Attachment; and in Garnishment §§ 1, 11 [28 C.J. p 16 notes 6–11, p 33 notes 97–2].

Attachment of privilege. In English law, a process by which a man, by virtue of his privilege, calls another to litigate in that court to which he himself belongs, and who has the privilege to answer there.[98]

Attachment of the forest. One of the three courts formerly held in forests. The highest court was called "justice in eyre's seat;" the middle, "the swainmote;" and the lowest, the "attachment."[99]

I. NATURE OF REMEDY, CAUSES OF ACTION, AND PARTIES

§ 1. Definition

An attachment is a proceeding to take a defendant's property into legal custody to satisfy a plaintiff's demand.

"Attachment," as the term is used in this Title, may be defined as a proceeding, or the writ by which the purpose of such proceeding is accomplished, the object of which is to hold property to abide the order of the court for the payment of a judgment in the event a debt shall be established,[1] and in this meaning it is used to describe a security given by law to a plaintiff for the purpose of satisfying such judgment or decree as he may obtain,[2] it being procedural in its character[3] and a remedy or a part of a remedy for the collection of a debt.[4] In a broader sense the term is employed with reference to the taking and holding of either a person or property on mesne process, subject either to the further order of the court or to final judgment in the case,[5] but as so used with reference to the seizure of a person, as distinguished from a seizure of property, it is discussed in other titles, the arrest of a defendant on mesne process in civil actions having been considered in the title Arrest §§ 23–86, while attachment in proceedings to punish for contempt will be treated in the title Contempt §§ 76–80 [13 C.J. p 68 note 33–p 72 note 5], and the attachment of a juror or a witness in order to secure his attendance will be treated in the titles Juries § 203 [35 C.J. p 305 note 53–p 306 note 61] and Witnesses § 29 [70 C.J. p 62 note 61–p 64 note 11].

In its broader sense the verb "attach" is used with reference to any seizure of property for the purpose of bringing it within the custody of the court.[6]

Ancillary attachment is an attachment sued out in aid of a suit already brought,[7] a proceeding in aid of the personal action when the debtor has been served or has appeared in court so as to be liable to a personal judgment.[8]

Assignment for benefit of creditors distinguished see Assignments for Benefit of Creditors § 4

Appointment of receiver distinguished

"(1) An attachment issues, as it were, of right upon the application of the plaintiff, whilst the appointment of a receiver lies largely in the discretion of the trial judge; (2) an attachment issues ex parte, whilst a receiver can be appointed only after a hearing of the other party; (3) an attachment inures exclusively to the benefit of plaintiff and gives him a preference over other creditors, whilst a receiver inures to the benefit of all creditors alike and gives no preference to plaintiff, (4) an attachment protects plaintiff alone, whilst a receivership protects all creditors, and often even the defendant itself against the importunity of creditors, and (5) above all an attachment remains under sole control of plaintiff, who may persist in it or recall it as he thinks proper, whilst a receivership puts the property in the hands of the court itself for the benefit of all, and neither the duration of the receivership, nor the acts of the receiver, are in any manner subject to the wishes of the plaintiff"—Uncle Sam Planting & Mfg. Co. v. Reynaud, 103 So. 276, 277, 157 La. 955

3. State ex rel. and to Use of St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 251 S.W. 383, 388, 298 Mo. 474, certiorari granted State of Missouri ex rel. St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 44 S.Ct. 132, 263 U.S. 696, 68 L.Ed. 511, affirmed 45 S.Ct. 47, 266 U.S. 200, 69 L.Ed. 247, 42 A.L.R. 1232

4. McInnes v. McKay, 141 A. 699, 127 Me. 110, affirmed McKay v. McInnes, 49 S.Ct. 344, 279 U.S. 820, 73 L.Ed. 975.

As "action"

A proceeding by attachment to collect a debt is an action in the full legal sense of the word—Jacoby v. Shafer, 105 Pa. 610, 615—Allan v. Partlow, 3 S.C. 417, 418—6 C.J. p 31 note 14 [h].

5. Beardsley v. Beecher, 47 Conn. 408

"The original purpose of an attachment is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary as follows. 'Taking into the custody of the law the person or property of one already before the court, or one whom it is sought to bring before it.'"—Nicely v. Nicely, 8 Tenn.App. 134, 136.

Attachment to compel appearance was a common-law writ called attachment or pone from its language, "pone per vadium et salvos plegios," put by gage and safe pledges A. B. defendant, etc. This was a writ, not issuing out of chancery, but out of the court of common pleas, being grounded on the nonappearance of defendant at the return of the original writ, and thereby the sheriff was commended to attach him, by taking gage, that is, certain of his goods, which he was to forfeit if he did not appear, or by making him find safe pledges or sureties, who were to be amerced in case of his nonappearance. This was the second process in an ordinary suit, then following the summons, and the first process in actions of trespass vi et armis or for other trespasses against the peace, such as deceit or conspiracy, where the violence of the wrong required a more speedy remedy—Bond v. Ward, 7 Mass. 123, 5 Am.D. 28—Penoyar v. Kelsey, 44 N.E. 788, 150 N.Y. 77, 34 L.R.A. 248—6 C.J. p 30 note 9.

7. Templeton v. Mason, 65 S.W. 25, 107 Tenn. 625—6 C.J. p 29 note 3.

8. Southern California Fruit Exch. v. Stamm, 54 P. 345, 9 N.M. 361—6 C.J. p 29 note 4.

Auxiliary and judicial writs distinguished. In some jurisdictions a distinction is drawn between an original or judicial attachment and an auxiliary writ, in that a judicial attachment performs the office of conferring jurisdiction on the court in which the creditor seeks satisfaction of his debt by seizing the debtor's property located within the state, the proceeding being a direct one to give jurisdiction to the court both of the person and subject matter in controversy to the extent of appropriating the property seized to the satisfaction of the judgment for money which the plaintiff recovers, while an auxiliary writ, when properly issued and served, merely enables plaintiff to hold, pending final judgment, property belonging to defendant out of the proceeds of the sale of which he would be entitled to have his judgment satisfied.[9]

Foreign attachment is a process by which the property of a foreign debtor is attached for the satisfaction of a debt due from him to plaintiff.[10]

"General" or "special." There is, in the absence of a statutory definition to that effect, no division of attachment into "general" and "special," or writs directed against all, or against particular, property only; the only kind of attachment is a writ in which the sheriff is commanded to seize the property of the debtor, generally, to satisfy the demand of the attaching creditor.[11]

"Execution" distinguished. Attachment is a form of execution issued before judgment,[12] or, as otherwise described, it is in the nature of a preliminary execution to secure satisfaction of plaintiff's claim.[13] The writs of attachment and execution are essentially different, however; the former is issued for the purpose of seizing property and holding it in order that, if a judgment should be obtained, the property thus seized will be forthcoming to satisfy such judgment, while the latter is a writ issued for the purpose of enforcing a judgment that has been obtained.[14]

"Garnishment" distinguished. Generally speaking, garnishment is but a form of attachment looking to the impounding of debts due a defendant in a civil action for the recovery of money, pending the rendering of final judgment therein, in effect the same as physical property capable of delivery is seized to that end by ordinary attachment.[15] A garnishment, however, differs from an attachment in that in garnishment usually there is no actual seizure of the property and no specific lien is acquired thereon.[16] The result is that, while seizure of property under attachment may cause its entire loss or considerable injury, garnishment merely impounds the property in the garnishee's possession and maintains its status quo until determination of the main action.[17] Furthermore, garnishment proceedings are usually directed to personal property.[18] Garnishment proceedings have been held to be included within the term "attachment" as used in statutes generally,[19] but are not within the meaning of a statute which has reference to real estate only.[20]

law, and first arose in England in the form of a local custom of London merchants, out of which, as modified and extended by statute, has grown the modern law of attachment.[21]

The proceeding as it exists in the United States to-day is deemed to be a summary and extraordinary remedy in derogation of the common law and has been said to owe its existence entirely to statutory enactment,[22] and it follows that no right or title can be acquired by its exercise unless there has been a strict compliance with the provisions of the statute, or a substantial compliance in those states where it is provided that attachment statutes shall be liberally construed.[23]

(2) Original or Auxiliary Process

Ordinarily, the attachment is a mere provisional remedy ancillary to an action, although in some jurisdictions it may also be used as an original process commencing suit.

Although under some statutes an attachment may be made an original process for the commencement of a suit,[24] the proceeding is usually a mere pro-

Statute applicable
Provisions of the District Court Act concerning attachments provide a separate and distinct mode of procedure regarding attachments issuing out of district courts, and attachments issued must be tested by whether there has been compliance with the letter and spirit of the provisions of the act.—Nanuet Logging Co. v. Hanson, 186 A 573, 14 N J Misc. 631.

In Louisiana
(1) Under Code Pract arts 254, 255, a writ of attachment in the case of a nonresident is not merely a conservatory writ, but the basis and foundation of the jurisdiction, which cannot be acquired except under the very letter of the law—Latham v. Glasscock, 108 So. 100, 160 La 1089—Pugh v. Flannery, 92 So. 699, 151 La 1063.
(2) "There are two classes of attachments: (1) Where the writ is merely incidental to a demand in personam, (2) where the proceeding is in rem, operating only upon the visional remedy, ancillary to an action commenced at or before the time when the attachment is sued out.[25] Being of this nature, the attachment does not affect the decision of the case on the merits;[26] the right to recover judgment on the alleged indebtedness and the right to attach the property of the debtor are entirely separate and distinct,[27] and the judgment in the main action neither changes the nature, nor determines the validity, of the attachment.[28] If the attachment be dissolved, this alone will not necessarily defeat the action;[29] although it has been said that the abatement of the main suit discharges the attachment and restores the property to defendant.[30]

After a suit has abated, it is not competent to sue out an attachment in that cause, because such affidavit and attachment must be sued out in a pending cause.[31]

Foreign attachment statutes are intended to compel the constructive presence in court of defendant, who, by reason of his absence from its jurisdiction without a dwelling-place therein, cannot be served with a summons.[32]

(3) Mesne or Final Process

The writ is mesne process.

A writ of attachment is mesne and not final process.[33]

(4) Legal or Equitable Proceeding

Attachment is in general essentially a legal proceeding.

As a general rule attachment is essentially a legal proceeding, and is in no way appropriate to ascertain and settle equitable rights;[34] and in a case where, from a conflict of jurisdiction or from other causes, the remedy by attachment is not full and complete, a court of equity will have no power property seized. In the first class, the proceeding is a conservatory process provided by law in aid of and to protect the creditor's right under certain circumstances in a suit against the debtor The citation is the basis of the action, with the attachment merely as an incident thereof In the second class, the action is unconnected with any personal demand, and is binding only upon the property seized The attachment itself is the principal demand, is the very foundation of the suit, and stands in the place of the citation required in ordinary proceedings"—Burgin Bros. & McCane v. to pass any order to aid or perfect it,[35] although the lien obtained by the levying of an attachment affords to plaintiff in attachment the footing requisite to enable him to maintain a bill in equity to set aside a fraudulent deed which impedes the operation of the writ.[36] The question of whether an attachment may be had in proceedings in equity will be considered in section 8 b.

(5) In Rem or in Personam

Attachment proceedings partake of the nature both of a proceeding in rem and of an action in personam.

Attachment is sometimes spoken of as being in rem;[37] but, strictly speaking, this is incorrect, as a proceeding in rem is taken irrespective of parties and is binding on the whole world, while the attachment affects the particular debtor only and is binding on him alone,[38] and the property is brought before the court merely in aid of the remedy against the individual sued.[39] The fact is that the proceeding by attachment is of a dual nature, partaking of the nature of a proceeding in rem and also of an action in personam.[40] When no jurisdiction is obtained over the debtor's person, the remedy partakes of the nature of a proceeding in rem, in that it proceeds against the property in the custody of the court and the judgment binds such property only; but where jurisdiction of the debtor's person is obtained, either by personal service or appearance, the action in which the proceeding is had is, ordinarily, in personam and a personal judgment is rendered without regard to the attachment.[41] Accordingly, the fact that property was attached for security does not affect the character of the main action as a personal one where there was personal service therein.[42]

b. Purpose

The purpose of attachment is to compel defendant's appearance and secure a contingent lien on his property.

Originally, the purpose of the attachment laws seems to have been simply to compel the appearance of a debtor over whose person jurisdiction could not be obtained by ordinary process;[43] but at an early date the remedy was generally extended by statute so as to serve the double purpose of compelling defendant's appearance and securing to plaintiff the benefit of such judgment as he might recover.[44] Under the present statutes, in most jurisdictions, the chief purpose served by the remedy is to secure a contingent lien on defendant's property until plaintiff can, by appropriate proceedings, obtain a judgment and have such property applied to its satisfaction,[45] or to make some provision for unsecured debts in cases where the means of satisfaction thereof are liable to be removed beyond the jurisdiction, or improperly disposed of or concealed, or otherwise placed beyond the reach of

Attachment against nonresidents

The purpose of the law authorizing attachments against property of nonresidents, is to furnish resident creditors a process whereby they may enforce their demands against nonresident debtors, at least to the extent of the property seized—Burgin Bros & McCane v. Barker Baking Co., 95 So. 227, 152 La. 1057.

creditors[46] It is not the purpose of an attachment to deplete the fund or pay out the property attached, or its proceeds;[47] and the security provided is not for the debt, but for the satisfaction of the judgment which results from the prosecution of the action, and it is given to the creditor by law, not by voluntary action of the debtor.[48] Attachment is not a proper remedy by which to recover specific property.[49]

§ 3. What Law Governs

The law of the forum controls the validity and effect of attachment proceedings as to property within the jurisdiction.

As remedies are governed exclusively by the laws of the place where they are prosecuted, the validity and effect of attachment proceedings must be determined by the laws of the state in which they are brought, provided the property attached is within the jurisdiction of such state.[50] Accordingly, where land of a nonresident has been attached in proceedings commenced in the state in which the land was situated, such nonresident cannot, in a subsequent action by him in the state of his domicile, obtain relief under the attachment laws of the latter state.[51]

§ 4. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

a. In general
b. Construction
c. Restrospective operation
d. Repeal

a. In General

The remedy of attachment being statutory, it is ordinarily within the power of the legislature to impose such limitations and restrictions on it as it may deem proper.

The remedy by attachment, being, as has been seen in section 2, of purely statutory creation and origin, it is within the legislative power, subject to such restrictions as may be imposed by the provisions of the state and federal constitutions, to determine the actions in, and the conditions under, which it may be resorted to and to place such restrictions and limitations on the rights of attaching creditors as may be deemed advisable,[52] the right to the remedy not being absolute.[53] Thus, statutes have been upheld which permit the remedy in actions for the direct payment of money by reason of a breach of contract, but do not afford the remedy in cases of breaches of a different character;[54] or which authorize attachments in chancery against the property of nonresidents,[55] or attachments against nonresidents alone,[56] or attachment without the requirement of an affidavit or bond;[57] or permit nonattaching creditors to share pro rata with attaching creditors, where the proceeds of defendant's property are insufficient to pay all judgments against him.[58]

b. Construction

(1) Strict construction
(2) Liberal construction

(1) Strict Construction

In some jurisdictions statutory provisions affording the right to attachment, as distinguished from those providing the means by which attachment may be resisted, are to be construed strictly.

Attachment being an extraordinary and summary remedy in derogation of the common law, the courts will usually, in the absence of any statutory requirement to the contrary, construe the statutes strictly in favor of those against whom the proceeding is employed, both as to the subject matter of the attachment and the method of enforcing the remedy, and will exact of plaintiff a strict compliance with all the statutory requirements.[59]

6 C.J. p 36 note 46.

In Alabama
(1) Attachment being a harsh and extraordinary remedy, the statutes authorizing and regulating it are

The remedy must be closely confined within the limits assigned by the legislature and cannot be extended by implication beyond the terms of the statute creating it,[60] but the court will not push the strict construction so far as to nullify the beneficial intent of the statute and leave the creditor remediless.[61] No presumptions will be indulged in support of an attachment where there is an apparent departure from the statute,[62] but the proceedings must on their face show affirmatively that the requirements of the statute have been complied with.[63]

A statute providing means for resisting an attachment is not subject to the rule of strict construction.[64]

(2) Liberal Construction

In some jurisdictions, either by express legislative requirement or by judicial interpretation, a liberal construction is afforded to attachment statutes.

In a number of jurisdictions, under express provision of the statutes, attachment laws are liberally construed,[65] while in other states the courts, having regard to the intention of the legislatures, have construed strictly in favor of those against whom they are employed—Herrick v. Herrick, 65 So. 146, 186 Ala. 439.

(2) In an early case a general statutory declaration that "the attachment law of this state shall not be rigidly construed" was applied in the case of an act making the remedy available in a suit in chancery.—Flake v. Day, 22 Ala. 132

(3) Under the aforementioned statute, it was said that the remedy assumed a more favorable attitude than theretofore in the system of jurisprudence—Pearsoll v. Middlebrook, 2 Stew & P. 406.

In Texas

(1) Attachment proceedings are strictly juris and a compliance with the requisites of the statute is essential to their validity—Massman v. Snyder, (CCA) 37 F(2d) 825, affirming (DC) 27 F.(2d) 542—Kildare Lumber Co v. Atlanta Bank, 41 SW. 64, 91 Tex. 95—Givens v. Taylor, 6 Tex 315—Wooster v. McGee, 1 Tex 17—Sloo v. Powell, Dall. 467.

(2) On the other hand, it has been held that, under a general statutory provision that attachment proceedings shall be liberally construed to effect their objects and promote justice, strictness in attachment proceedings is exacted only so far as to require substantial compliance with the material provisions of the law—Lewis v. Stewart, 62 Tex. 352

(3) Any material variation from the letter of the law will vitiate all subsequent proceedings—Burch v. Watts, 37 Tex 135—Raquet v. Nixon, Dall. 386—Whitley v. Jackson, 1 Tex. App Civ Cas. § 574.

(4) Every uncertainty must be explained, if at all, by the proceedings themselves—Focke v. Hardeman, 2 S.W. 363, 67 Tex. 173.

(5) There should be an exact and literal compliance with the statutory requirements.—Caldwell v. Haley, 3 Tex. 317.

In Georgia

(1) The old doctrine of strict construction is intentionally overturned by a statute providing that a substantial compliance with its provisions shall be sufficient—Force v. Hubbard, 26 Ga 289—Irvin v. Howard, 37 Ga. 18—Kennon v. Evans, 36 Ga. 89.

(2) Formerly attachment laws were construed strictly—Force v. Hubbard, supra—Clark v. Tuggle, 18 Ga. 604—Mills v Findlay, 14 Ga. 230—Levy v. Millman, 7 Ga 167.

In Iowa

(1) Under statutes expressly so providing, attachment laws are liberally construed—Farmers' and Merchants' Bank of Aurora v. Wells & Potter, 179 N W 838, 189 Iowa 1312—Donnelly v. Dripps, 167 N W. 102—Magoon v. Gillett, 6 N.W. 131, 54 Iowa 54

(2) Prior to the enactment of the statute, a strict construction was resorted to—Tiffany v. Glover, 3 Greene 337—Musgrave v. Brady, Morr. 456—Wilkie v. Jones, Morr. 97.

(3) The doctrine of strict construction is not to be carried to an extent operating to suspend the law and leave attaching creditors remediless—Bretney v. Jones, 1 Greene 366.

In Mississippi

(1) Under statutory provisions requiring the attachment law to be construed in the most liberal manner, the court will consider whatever is the fair meaning of the law and, where necessary, will expound it differently from its letter in order to preserve its intent.—Saunders v. Columbus L, etc, Ins. Co., 43 Miss 583—Augusta Bank v. Conrey, 28 Miss. 667—Bryan v. Lashley, 21 Miss 284—Dandridge v. Stevens, 20 Miss. 723

(2) The fact that the statute does not in terms apply to antecedent transactions will not prevent the court from giving it a retroactive effect—Green v. Anderson, 29 Miss. 359

(3) All the provisions of the statute must be strictly observed—Rankin v Dulaney, 43 Miss 197—Wolley v. Bowie, 41 Miss 553—Foster v. Simmons, 40 Miss 585—Robertson v. Johnson, 40 Miss 500—Gates v Flint, 39 Miss. 365—Roy v. Heard, 38 Miss. 544—Jefferies v Harvie, 38 Miss 97—Hopkins v. Grissom, 26 Miss 143.

(4) The fact that an affidavit does not pursue the precise language of the statute is not ground for quashing the attachment where the sense is the same—Lee v. Peters, 9 Miss. 503

In New Jersey

(1) Under its express terms, the attachment statute must be liberally construed in favor of creditors.—Lastowski v. Lawnicki, 179 A 266, 115 N J Law 230—Devlan v. Wells, 47 A. 467, 65 N.J Law 213—Jersey City v. Horton, 38 N J.Law 38—Thompson v. Eastburn, 16 N.J Law 100.

(2) On the other hand, it has been said that the right should not be extended by construction—Pullinger v. Van Emburgh, 16 N J.Law 457—Levinson v. Seeman Bros., 166 A. 630. 11 N.J Misc. 402.

In Ohio

(1) Under a general provision of Gen.Code § 10214, to the effect that inclined to adopt liberal construction independently of express statutory provisions.[66] In any case, however, a person seeking the benefit of this summary remedy must bring himself clearly within the material provisions of the statute.[67]

The policy of mesne attachment should be adjusted to other policies, and, in ascertaining the legislative will, notice should be taken of conflicting policies.[68]

c. Retrospective Operation

A remedy created by an attachment statute may, in the absence of a showing of a contrary statutory intent, be resorted to as to acts before its enactment.

It has been held in some cases that a statute giving the remedy by attachment, in cases where it had not previously existed, may operate retrospectively so as to embrace acts committed before its passage;[69] but, when the statute is not intended to be retroactive, it will have no effect on proceedings commenced previous to its going into operation.[70]

d. Repeal

An attachment statute may be expressly or impliedly repealed, although vested rights will be protected.

An attachment statute may, like any other statute, be repealed by implication, where the legislature enacts a subsequent statute inconsistent therewith,[71] but the general rule that repeals by implication are not favored applies to such statutes, so that the earlier statute will not be held to be repealed, where the provisions of the later statute the remedial provisions of the code shall be liberally construed, and that the common-law rule of strict construction of statutes in derogation thereof shall have no application to remedial statutes, attachment laws must be liberally construed.—Smith v. Buck, 162 N E 382, 119 Ohio St 101, 61 A.L R. 1343—Hart v. Andrews, 132 N E. 846, 103 Ohio St 218—Weirick v. Mansfield Lumber Co, 117 N E 362, 96 Ohio St 386—Bridge v. Ring, 157 N.E. 496, 25 Ohio App 149

(2) On the other hand, it has been held that attachment, being an extraordinary remedy, the provision of the statute allowing it should be strictly construed—Taylor v. McDonald, 4 Ohio 149—West Side Motor Co. v. Politz Bros, 161 N E. 22, 27 Ohio App 116—Humphrey v. Wood, Wright 566—Orlopp v Schueller, 26 Ohio Cir Ct. 127—Hoyman v Beverstock, 8 Ohio Cir Ct. 473, 4 Ohio Cir Dec. 491—L L LeVeque Co v Ross, 31 Ohio N P.(N S) 185—Meade v. Rice, 19 Ohio N P (N S) 173—Harris v. Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Ry Co, 5 Ohio N P.(N S) 173

In Tennessee the attachment law, by express direction of statute, is liberally construed.—Neihaus v. C B Barker Construction Co, 186 S W. 461, 135 Tenn. 382, Ann Cas.1918B 23—6 C J. p 37 note 52 66. Gilna v. Barker, 254 P. 169, 78 Mont. 342—6 C J. p 37 note 53.

Equitable proceedings

A statute providing for attachment in equitable proceedings, being remedial, is entitled to a liberal interpretation.—Marah v. Moore, 161 A. 227, 52 R.I. 458.

In Illinois

(1) In view of the liberal nature of the attachment laws, a strict construction would defeat the evident intention of the legislature.—Hannibal, etc., R Co. v. Crane, 102 Ill. 249, 40 Am R. 581.

(2) The remedies by attachment, being in derogation of the common law, should not be extended by implication—G. W. Bull & Co. v. Boston & Maine R. R., 175 N E. 337, 344 Ill. 11.

(3) In early cases, a strict construction was placed on the statutes as providing a remedy in derogation of the common law—May v. Baker, 15 Ill 89—Rowley v Berrian, 12 Ill. 198—Moore v Hamilton, 7 Ill 429—Britton v. Gregg, 96 Ill App 29, affirmed 61 N E 1024, 193 Ill 394. See Weber Chimney Co. v. Johnson, 205 Ill App 348.

In Maryland

(1) The principal has been firmly established that the attachment statute will be liberally construed in determining what steps must be taken to confer jurisdiction on the court issuing the attachment.—Gill v Physicians' and Surgeons' Bldg, 138 A. 674, 153 Md. 394—Turner v Lytle, 59 Md. 199—McPherson v Snowden, 19 Md 197—Brown v. Somerville, 8 Md. 444.

(2) The statute will be more liberally construed on the question of whether the acts of an attaching creditor amount to a compliance with its requirements—Gill v Physicians' and Surgeons' Bldg, supra.

(3) A substantial compliance with the statute is deemed sufficient.—Hedrick v Markham, 103 A. 98, 132 Md 160—Tonns v. Collins, 81 A. 219, 116 Md 55—Gunby v Porter, 31 A. 324, 80 Md. 402—Randle v. Wilson, 5 Harr. & J. 130, 9 Am D. 497

In North Carolina

(1) It is held that attachment is a statutory remedy in derogation of common law, and hence must be strictly construed—Bethell v. Lee, 158 S E 493, 200 N C. 755—Carson v. Woodrow, 75 S E 996, 160 N C. 143—Parker v Scott, 64 N C. 118—Leak v. Moorman, 61 N.C. 168.

(2) Notwithstanding, substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute is sufficient—Bethell v. Lee, supra—Best v. British, etc., Co, 38 S E 923, 128 N C. 351—Grant v. Burgwyn, 79 N.C. 513.

In Utah

(1) Attachment statutes are to be construed liberally to effect their purpose, but, where a failure to observe a statutory requirement constitutes a jurisdictional defect, the courts cannot disregard it.—Cole v Utah Sugar Co., 99 P. 681, 35 Utah 143.

(2) "The process of attachment is a special statutory remedy, and, in resorting to it, the terms of the law conferring it must be strictly pursued"—Bowers v. London Bank of Utah, 4 P. 225, 226, 3 Utah 417.

are not so plainly inconsistent therewith that both cannot stand.[72]

It has been held that the repeal of an act authorizing attachment, or the repeal of one of the grounds of attachment, pending proceedings thereunder but before the attachment lien has been perfected by judgment, will operate to divest the lien in the absence of any saving clause excepting pending attachments,[73] but, where the lien of the attachment has been perfected by judgment, it becomes a vested right which cannot be taken away by subsequent legislation.[74]

§ 5. Existence of or Resort to Other Remedy

The availability of other remedies is immaterial where attachment proceedings are rightfully brought.

Where plaintiff is entitled to an attachment as of right, the availability of other remedies is immaterial.[75] Accordingly, an attachment may issue against the principal of a note alone, although there is a surety thereon, amply able to pay,[76] and in an action on a judgment, foreign attachment may issue to secure property of the debtor which cannot be taken by execution, although he has visible property on which execution may be levied.[77] An attachment proceeding in one county to acquire a lien on defendant's property is not irregular because of a pending suit in assumpsit elsewhere for the same debt.[78]

§ 6. —— Arrest as Concurrent Remedy

Attachment and arrest are concurrent remedies, but property and body attachments will not lie on the same writ.

Attachment lies against defendant's property, although he has been previously arrested on process issued in the same cause,[79] but defendant's property cannot be attached and his body taken on the same writ.[80]

Where the writ is against two defendants, one of them may be arrested and the property of the other attached.[81]

§ 7. Extraterritorial Operation

An attachment has in itself no extraterritorial operation in personam.

The process of attachment is effectual for the direct and legitimate purpose of enforcing the application of the property attached according to the laws of the state where it is found, although defendant in the attachment proceeding is a nonresident,[82] but a judgment rendered in one state on an attachment of property, where there has been no personal service of process on defendant, and no appearance by him, has no extraterritorial validity so far as the person of defendant is concerned.[83]

Where defendant is served with process or appears in the action and submits to the jurisdiction of the court, the judgment in an attachment case must be given the same effect outside of the state as any other judgment.[84]

§ 8. Causes of Action or Demands Authorizing Attachment

a. In general
b. Legal or equitable

a. In General

Attachment will lie only in the case of causes of action or demands within the intent of the statute affording the remedy.

In order to warrant the issuance of a writ of attachment there must be a cause of action in plaintiff against defendant,[85] which must be of the character to which the statutes under which the proceedings are had apply.[86] The fact that a statute prescribing the grounds on which an attachment may issue does not authorize the issuance of an attachment in some cases, in which, if an attachment were authorized, the general statute prescribing the venue of attachment proceedings would be broad enough to lay the venue thereof, may not properly be said to constitute a conflict between the two statutes requiring the first-mentioned statute to be construed in harmony with it and as permitting an attachment in such additional cases.[87]

b. Legal or Equitable

An attachment cannot, in the absence of express statutory permission, be had in proceedings in equity although its issuance will not be precluded in some jurisdictions by the fact that equitable relief is incidentally involved in a proceeding otherwise within the attachment statutes.

In some jurisdictions the statutes governing attachments have been construed to restrict the issuance of writs of attachment to actions at law,[88] while in other jurisdictions, either by express provision of the statutes or judicial construction thereof, they have been construed to permit the remedy in equity as well as at law.[89] So, under a statute which permits that an attachment may issue in any action, and where in the particular jurisdiction the distinction between law and equity has been abolished by the code, an attachment may issue in equity actions.[90] Under a statute permitting attachment in actions on claims arising out of contract, it is not material whether the petition states an action in law or one in equity,[91] and, under a statute permitting an attachment in proceedings for the recovery of money, it has been held that attachment may issue in a proceeding of an equitable character as well as in an action at law.[92] So, where the statute permits the ancillary remedy of attachment in actions on contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money, and does not in terms prescribe that the action must be in law or that it may not be in equity or that it may not be one of either law or equity or both, it is not necessary, to uphold a writ of attachment, to establish the proposition that the action is either legal or equitable.[93] The fact that an attachment cannot be had in a proceeding wherein equitable relief as such is sought will not preclude an attachment in proceedings wherein some exercise of equitable

Attachment in aid of pending actions

Illinois Attachment Act § 31, authorizing attachments in aid of pending actions of assumpsit, debt, covenant, trespass, or trespass on the case, on the filing of bond and affidavit showing right to attachment under § 1, does not limit attachments in aid of pending actions to actions on an indebtedness in which original attachment is authorized under § 1, but merely requires that one of the grounds of attachment specified in § 1, such as nonresidence, fraudulent transfer, etc., shall exist.—Hoosier Veneer Co. v. Trusts & Guarantee Co., (C.C.A.Ill.) 283 F. 1, certiorari denied Trusts & Guarantee Co. v. Hoosier Veneer Co., 43 S.Ct. 97, 260 U.S. 738, 67 L.Ed. 489.

"Nature, character or origin" of "claim"

In a statute providing that "in all suits . . . in which the demand is for a money judgment and the defendant is a nonresident of this State, or when the defendant is not domiciled in this State, whatever may be the nature, character or origin of the plaintiff's claim, the plaintiff shall have the right to sue out a writ of attachment," the word "claim" refers to the facts giving rise to the demand which show the right asserted, and is synonymous with "cause of action," the word "nature" enlarges the right of attachment to embrace every description of legal demand for money, whether arising ex contractu, quasi ex contractu, or from tort, the word "character" means class or division to which the claim belongs, such as contract or tort; and the word "origin" does not mean the facts from which the action arises, but the place or locality where the cause of action arose.—Jackson State Nat. Foreign attachment

(1) Where a writ of foreign attachment issues in a suit in equity in accordance with the act of March 28, 1887, an independent action at law begins which awaits the result of the suit in equity and is determined thereby.—Stewart v. Parnell, 8 Pa.Co. 604.

(2) Under a statute undertaking to provide for equity a proceeding analogous to that of foreign attachment at law, a complainant must bring his case within the plain purview of its terms.—Cantor v. Sachs, 162 A. 73, 13 Del.Ch. 359.

Procedure distinct

powers is incidentally involved in the action if in other respects the pleadings warrant it,[94] and an attachment will issue where the complaint shows that the action is for the recovery of a specific sum of money on a contract, express or implied, although the equitable powers of the court are incidentally involved,[95] as where, in an action for a return of consideration paid, based on a promise implied by law because of fraud, plaintiff, in addition to a money judgment, prays for equitable relief,[96] or where, in an action for a sum due for goods sold and delivered to a corporation, plaintiff seeks equitable relief against, and seeks to attach the property of, one whom he claims to be the sole owner of such corporation.[97] So, an attachment may be had in an action for the recovery of money, notwithstanding other specific relief, equitable in its character, is also demanded.[98]

In the application of the rules hereinbefore stated, it has been held that an action for an accounting, being one in equity, will not support a writ of attachment,[99] except as it may be authorized by statute,[1] and that an attachment cannot be had in such an action under a statute giving the remedy by attachment in actions to recover a sum of money only;[2] but, under the rule that, when in other respects the action is such that an attachment is warranted, its issuance will not be precluded by the fact that an exercise of equitable powers is incidentally involved, an attachment may be had in an action for a money judgment, although an accounting is necessary,[3] as, for example, where, in an action on an implied contract for the payment of money, the exercise of equitable powers in settling accounts and striking a balance is involved,[4] or where, in an action by an agent for commissions of which he does not know the exact amount although the principal knows and refuses to inform him, he seeks an accounting and a judgment for the amount which he alleges and believes to be due to him.[5]

A proceeding for foreclosure of a mortgage on realty is one in which an attachment may be had in some jurisdictions under statutes permitting attachment in actions for the recovery of money,[6] and a similar holding has been made with relation to a proceeding for foreclosure of a mechanic's lien,[7] although in other jurisdictions a contrary conclusion has been reached with relation to a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage.[8] Under a statute permitting an attachment in any action where the requisite grounds are present, it may issue in an action to foreclose a mortgage.[9] An attachment has been held proper in proceedings to foreclose a chattel mortgage, under a statute allowing the remedy in actions to recover on a contract express or implied.[10]

A suit for specific performance is not one in which an attachment may be had under a statute authorizing attachment in actions to recover only a sum of money.[11]

Speculative damages

Since a suit for an administrator's accounting, where respondents were charged with participation in a joint fraud, is cognizable in equity, the issuance of a writ of attachment therein is proper and it will not be quashed on the contention that the damages claimed were too speculative when, although the amount thereof is uncertain, it is determinable by established rules of law and equity.—Marsh v. Cause of action for specific performance stated

A complaint alleging employment of plaintiff broker to sell property for a commission payable in the kind of property received, that a sale was made for corporate stock, that stock of a specified value was due from defendant, and demanding judgment for it or its value, if transferred, stated a cause of action for specific performance, and not for a sum of money so as to authorize attachment. —Olsen v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 128 N.E. 908, 230 N.Y. 31, modifying 173 N.Y.S. 916, 187 App.Div. 882.

A proceeding to set aside a fraudulent transfer is not one in which an attachment may be had under a statute allowing attachment in actions for the recovery of money only or for a wrongful conversion of personal property or for damages,[12] although there is authority to the contrary under a statute permitting an attachment in any action for the recovery of money or for the recovery of property.[13]

§ 9. —— Amount of Claim

The claim must be for a sufficient amount as required by statute.

Where statutes limit the right to attachment to cases in which the claim reaches or exceeds a certain amount, the claim must be of such amount.[14]

§ 10. —— Demand for Money or Damages

Attachment is confined to proceedings for the recovery of money only where the statute so provides.

Where the statute so provides, a remedy by attachment is limited to actions to recover a sum of money only,[15] and in such case it cannot be employed as a means of recovering specific property;[16] but under a statute giving the remedy in any suit pending for "damages," under certain conditions the attachment may issue in actions for money had and received and for debt as well as for compensation for a tort or breach of contract.[17]

§ 11. —— Demand Arising Out of Express Contract

a. In general
b. Direct payment of money
c. Contracts made or payable within state
d. Breach of promise of marriage

a. In General

Attachment is, ordinarily, expressly permitted in, and in some instances specifically restricted to, actions arising out of contracts, in which case it will issue in actions on express contracts.

Under a statute extending the remedy of attachment to actions ex contractu, it may be availed of in actions on demands arising out of contracts[18] and if the statute confines it to such actions it cannot be availed of in actions not so arising;[19] and, where this is the case, in order for plaintiff to be entitled to the writ, it is essential that contractual relations exist between him and defendant,[20] or else that the contract be made for his benefit.[21] Among other actions ex contractu with reference to which it has been held that attachment may properly issue may be mentioned actions on account stated,[22] bills of exchange or promissory notes,[23] bonds or undertakings,[24] coupons and scrip certificates;[25] actions for breach of contract generally,[26] or of contracts of purchase[27] or of sale,[28] or of breach of contracts of warranty,[29] or for the violation of a lease;[30] and actions for compensation for services,[31] or for the price of goods sold,[32] or for the value of property fraudulently obtained,[33] or to recover a balance due on a subscription to corporate stock,[34] or to enforce the liability of a stockholder of an insolvent corporation[35]

Effect of presence of tortious elements. Where the claim grows out of contract, its character as such is not affected, so as to preclude an attachment, by the fact that tortious elements are involved.[36]

b. Direct Payment of Money

Where the contract is for the direct payment of money an attachment may be had under statutes so providing.

Under statutes providing that attachment may be had in actions on contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money, an attachment may be had in an action on an express contract of this character.[37] The contract contemplated by such a statute is one the obligation of which is for a definite sum payable unconditionally and at a specific time.[38] According to some authorities, the requirement that the contract shall be for direct payment of money precludes a contract which is a collateral agreement or which is dependent on any other agreement,[39] although other authorities are to the contrary.[40]

The remedy has been held available in an action for damages for breach of contract where the damages are readily ascertainable by reference to the contract and the basis of computation is reasonable and definite[41]

Among instances of obligations or contracts on which attachment will lie may be mentioned actions on bail bonds,[42] depositary's bonds,[43] appeal

Ratification of conveyance

Where a life tenant was allegedly fraudulently induced to convey property to remaindermen by an instrument represented to be a lease and the remaindermen thereafter conveyed the property to a third party, the life tenant's action against the remaindermen to recover the difference between the value of the property and the amount received is a ratification of the conveyance, and attachment for such sum is based on a "demand arising on contract," since as respects attachment, a deed, on being executed and delivered, becomes a contract—Bridge v. Building contract

In a contractor's suit for damages for defendant's breach of contract to employ the contractor to construct a building, where the obligation of defendant to pay money in a specific amount was fixed by the contract, and the difference between the contract price and the cost of building, conceded to be the measure of damages, appeared, and the damages were the direct consequence of the repudiation of the contract by defendant, and the cost of labor and materials for constructing the building were capable of definite ascertainment, a motion to discharge the attachment by plaintiff on the ground that the sums due were not definite, liquidated, or capable of being made definite, was properly denied—Force v. Where defendant charterer agreed to ship cargo, of which the freight would be thirty thousand dollars, and totally failed to do so, and the ship sailed empty, an action by the owner for breach of the contract for damages in the amount of twenty-eight thousand dollars, two thousand dollars being the cost of loading and unloading such a cargo, is one for the breach of a contract for the direct payment of money, and an attachment may issue under Code Civ Proc § 537, the damages being easily ascertainable according to fixed standards supplied by the contract or the law acting on it.—Greenebaum v. Smith, 197 P. 675, 51 Cal App 692, error dismissed Smith v. Greenebaum, 44 S Ct. 332, 264 U S. 599, 68 L.Ed 869

bonds,[44] official bonds,[45] promissory notes providing for reasonable attorney's fees,[46] and the contract of an indorser or a guarantor of a promissory note or a bill of exchange.[47] On the other hand, on the theory that the obligation is conditional and binds the principal and sureties to pay, not an ascertained liquidated amount, but an amount determinable by the loss sustained by the payee on condition broken, it has been held that attachment will not issue in an action against the sureties on an indemnity bond for the faithful performance of an obligation,[48] nor on a contract guaranteeing the collection and payment of a note,[49] nor against the sureties on a bond conditioned to be void if the principal shall comply with the terms of a building contract.[50]

In determining the character of the action as falling within the intent of statutes of the kind under consideration, the allegations of the complaint are informative[51] and according to some authorities are alone to be considered.[52]

"Overdue" instrument. Under a statute authorizing a writ of attachment in actions brought on overdue promissory notes, bills of exchange, other written instruments for the payment of money, and on book accounts, an attachment cannot be had in an action on an appeal bond[53] or on an administrator's bond conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties,[54] since the statute contemplates instruments of the nature of those specifically mentioned which provide for an absolute and unconditional payment.[55]

c. Contracts Made or Payable within State

By statute the remedy by attachment may be limited to actions on contracts made or payable within the state.

In determining whether the remedy of attachment will lie, statutes limiting the right to actions on contracts which were made, or under which payment should be made, within the state, must be regarded,[56] and under such a provision it has been held that, where the contract was made outside of the state, it must provide by express stipulation or necessary implication for payment within the state in order to warrant an attachment,[57] and it is not enough that the money be payable wherever defendant may be found, and, therefore, payable in the state if he is found there.[58] The fact that some of several claims sued on were payable in another state does not, however, affect plaintiff's right to attachment on such of his claims as were payable in the state in which the attachment was sought.[59]

Codes (1921) §§ 8171, 8195, which created an absolute liability on the part of the sureties immediately on the default of the bank, and is sufficient to sustain an attachment of the sureties' property under § 9256, authorizing attachments in "actions on a contract express or implied for the direct payment of money."—State v. suit[60] or on money demands,[61] or debts or demands arising on contract,[62] the more general rule is that attachment will not be allowed in an action of this character.[63]

§ 12. —— Demand Arising Out of Implied Contract

a. In general
b Judgments

a. In General

Attachment is generally available in actions on implied contracts even though the demand involves tortious elements.

As a general rule under the statutes the right of attachment is not confined to cases in which the claim sued on is based on an express contract, but the remedy is also available in an action on an implied contract,[64] and this principle is applicable to a case where the contract is implied in law as well as where it is implied in fact.[65] Accordingly, attachment has been held an available remedy in an action to recover customs duties,[66] an action on an unliquidated demand for a breach of contract to exchange property,[67] an action to enforce the individual liability of bank stockholders for the debts of the corporation;[68] an action to enforce a claim acquired by subrogation,[69] and an action against a factor to recover the difference between the price at which goods sold and that authorized by contract.[70]

The fact that the demand involves tortious elements will not preclude the right to the writ if plaintiff elects to waive the tort and sue on the implied contract.[71] Accordingly, attachment has been held available in an action sounding in contract for money stolen,[72] embezzled,[73] won at gambling,[74] or obtained by fraud[75] or wrongful use of the process of attachment or garnishment;[76] for the value of timber wrongfully cut and removed,[77] for money[78] or property[79] converted; for damages to a common carrier or loss of goods by such carrier;[80] and for personal injuries to a passenger.[81]

Contracts for direct payment of money. Under a statute authorizing the issuance of a writ of attachment in an action on a contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money, an attachment is available in an action on such an implied contract,[82] and a contract implied in law as well as one implied from the facts of the case is an implied contract within the act.[83] The statute should be given a liberal rather than a technical meaning; and the rule, stated supra § 11 b, that the contract contemplated by the statute is such only as requires the payment unconditionally and absolutely of a definite sum applies in determining whether an action on an implied contract will justify the issuance of an attachment.[84]

Actions which have been held to be on an implied contract for the direct payment of money within the statutory provision include: An action against a husband for necessaries furnished to his wife with whom he was living at the time,[85] and an action by a surety who has paid the principal's obligation against a cosurety for contribution.[86] The remedy is also available in an action to enforce the statutory liability of a bank stockholder to make good an impairment of the capital stock;[87] and it has been held[88] and denied[89] that attachment would issue in an action on an implied contract to enforce the double liability of such stockholders. Attachment properly issues under the statute in an action to recover money paid on a contract wrongfully rescinded,[90] or the consideration of which has totally failed,[91] as where the contract was induced by fraud and plaintiff has received nothing of value;[92] but an implied contract to repay money received under contract, the consideration for which has entirely failed, may be considered a contract for the direct payment of money as basis for attachment proceedings only where nothing has been received in consideration for the amount sought to be recovered, and where the damages may be said to be liquidated and definitely ascertainable.[93] Plaintiff by waiving the tort and suing on an implied contract cannot, for the purpose of procuring an attachment, convert a tort action into an action ex contractu;[94] and where an exchange agreement was induced by misrepresentations regarding the value of property exchanged, and the exchange was voluntarily executed and not disavowed by either party, the injured party cannot waive the tort and recover on an implied contract, and hence an action brought by him must be on tort, which will not support an attachment.[95] An action for a breach of warranty in a contract of sale is not on an implied contract for the direct payment of money;[96] and neither is an action by the buyer of personalty against the sellers for

Reason for rule

The liability imposed by statute and assumed by defendant is in the nature of a guaranty, and under the holdings of this state a contract of guaranty is not one for the direct payment of money within the meaning of the attachment statute—Muri v. Young, 245 P. 956, 75 Mont. 213

Cases distinguished

"This conclusion is not at all in conflict with the decision in Home State Bank v. Schwartz, 234 P. 281, 72 Mont. 425 [supra]. The liability imposed by section 6109d, as added by Laws 1923, c. 90, which was then under consideration, differs from that involved in this case, in that the former imposes upon the stockholder a primary obligation running directly from him to the corporation, and has none of the elements of a guaranty"—Muri v. Partial failure of consideration

To establish an implied contract to repay the purchase price of corporate stock on the ground of failure of consideration, so as to render attachment available, there must be a total failure of consideration, that is, the stock must be valueless, and where plaintiff's allegations show that a cash dividend on the stock had been received the hypothesis that the stock was valueless is negatived, and hence attachment is not available—Powers v. damages from failure to deliver the full contract quantity where there was no express contract on defendant's part to pay money.[97] So, an action to recover a sum of money which plaintiff entrusted to his clerk, who lost it to defendant in gambling, will not support an attachment under the statute[98]

b. Judgments

Attachment may generally be issued in an action based on a judgment.

An action on a money judgment is one "arising on contract" within the meaning of the attachment statutes, whether such judgment was recovered on a contract or for a tort.[99] Accordingly, an attachment may, as a general rule, be issued in an action which is based on a judgment,[1] either domestic[2] or foreign,[3] even though plaintiff is entitled to execution on the judgment at the time of issuing the writ,[4] and defendant has visible property on which execution might be levied[5] Under statutes limiting the right to actions on contracts payable within the state, however, attachment is not warranted in an action on a foreign judgment, unless it in terms provides that payment shall be made in the state in which it is sought to be enforced.[6]

§ 13. —— Demand Arising Ex Delicto

a. Absence of express statutory provision

b. Statutes authorizing attachment

a. Absence of Express Statutory Provision

Attachment will not lie on demands arising ex delicto unless the remedy is extended to such cases by statute.

It is well settled as a general rule that attachment will not lie on demands arising ex delicto, unless it very clearly appears from the language of the statute that the legislature intended to extend the remedy to such cases,[7] and it is immaterial that the same measure of damages might be applied as would govern in case of a breach of contract[8] A fortiori, when it can be seen from the wording of the statute that it intends to require the relationship of debtor and creditor to exist between the parties, no attachment will lie on demands sounding in tort.[9] Moreover, the remedy cannot be made available by pleading a tort action as one sounding in contract.[10] Although, where actions in contract and tort joined in one complaint arise out of the same transaction, the availability of attachment is determined by specific allegations,[11] whether the action is founded in tort or on contract is not to be determined exclusively from the particular language in the complaint, if it be made to appear that the nature of the obligation sued on constitutes a tort; and if any doubt arises, the action shall be construed as tort.[12]

If an attachment is issued in such an action without statutory authority, a judgment against the at-

Actions sounding in contract

(1) In determining whether an action was in contract or in tort as bearing on the question whether issuance of attachment was proper, an allegation that, in consideration of reasonable hire, a carrier agreed to transport potatoes under standard ventilation, which meant that ventilators should be closed at thirty-two degrees above zero and opened above that temperature, in the absence of a legal showing to the contrary, imposed on the carrier a greater duty than the law imposed, and made the action sound in contract rather than in tort for violation of a public duty—Jacobs, Malcolm & Burtt v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 234 P. 328, 71 Cal App 42

(2) An action for breach of trust, to hold a constructive trustee to account for moneys received under a contract does not sound in tort—McClelland v. Linton, 180 S W. 482, 121 Ark 79.

Actions sounding in tort

(1) A cause of action for the procurement of a judgment by extrinsic fraud in the use of a false affidavit of service—Rosenberg v Bullard, 15 P (2d) 870, 127 Cal App. 315.

(2) Plaintiff, alleging fraud in the purchase of corporate stock and seeking rescission, is not entitled to tached property is void and may be collaterally attacked.[13]

b. Statutes Authorizing Attachment

Where statutes extend the remedy to demands arising ex delicto, attachment will be issued only in cases within the statute.

In a number of states the statutes now extend the remedy by attachment to claims arising ex delicto. Some of the statutes, in authorizing a resort to the remedy by attachment in actions sounding in tort, specify demands of a certain character, such as for the wrongful conversion of personal property, or personal injury, or injury to property in consequence of negligence, fraud, or other wrongful act; trespass or trespass on the case; or outrageous battery; and where this is the case attachment will lie in actions coming within the terms of the statute,[14] but the remedy will not be attachment, and the fact that the second count of the complaint was in the form of a common count for money had and received did not entitle plaintiff to attachment, where the first count showed that plaintiff's only cause of action was one founded on the alleged fraud—Stone v Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County, 4 P (2d) 777, 214 Cal 272, 77 A.L.R. 743

(3) In a suit, by plaintiff as trustee for the stockholders of a corporation which had forfeited its charter, where the complaint alleged that defendant, while acting in a fiduciary capacity, by fraudulent misrepresentations and acts induced the corporation to sell to defendant shares of stock in another corporation for a fraction of their value, the action was ex delicto as respects the right to an attachment—Hallidie v. Enginger, 166 P. 1, 175 Cal 505

(4) A complaint to recover money paid to a copartnership merely stating a cause of action in deceit, precludes the right to attachment—San Francisco Iron & Metal Co. v. Abraham, 296 P 82, 211 Cal 552

(5) An employer's action against an employee for damages to a truck driven by him through his negligence is not an action for money due under the contract of employment, the action being one for damages which were contingent upon the employee's failure to perform his contract.—King v. Cline, 194 P. 290, 49 Cal App. 696

(6) A claim against a town for the balance due a contractor based on the negligent failure of the town to levy a tax on the improvement districts to pay the contractor is one ex delicto, and not ex contractu, and is not subject to attachment—Neilson v Title Guaranty & Surety Co., 199 P. 948, 101 Or 262.

(7) A complaint, alleging that defendant assigned an interest in a claim to plaintiff and agreed not to settle without his knowledge and approval, and thereafter recovered judgment on the claim and without the knowledge or approval of plaintiff settled the claim, received a large sum of money therefor, and refused to pay any part of it to plaintiff, and that defendant made the settlement without authority, maliciously and fraudulently intending to convert the same, etc., and asking exemplary damages and a body execution, alleges a cause of action ex delicto, and an attachment was rightfully dissolved—Thuringer v. Bonner, 222 P. 1118, 74 Colo 539

Claim not arising in tort

A claim for damages for use of property under a contract providing therefor is not one arising ex delicto, and may be asserted against a nonresident defendant by a bill in chancery supported by attachment under a statute authorizing attachments in equity against a nonresident but not embracing damages for a tort—Perkins v Friedberg, 110 S E 618, 90 W Va. 185

Fraud or other wrongful act

Plaintiff, suing to recover money only for alleged fraud or other wrongful act, was entitled to a warrant of attachment under Civ Pract Act § 902, authorizing the remedy in such case—Gobel v Gobel Estate Corporation, 280 N Y S 32, 224 App Div. 761.

Personal injury

(1) The words "personal injury by wrongful act," within the meaning of a statute allowing attachment in actions for such injury, comprehend injuries by libel or slander—Smith v Buck, 162 N.E 382, 119 Ohio St. 101, 61 A L R. 1343.

(2) So, where the statute provides for an attachment in actions for any "injury to the person, caused by negligence or wrongful act"—Tisdale v Eubanks, 104 S E 339, 180 N C. 153, 11 A.L.R. 374.

(3) Under the act providing an action for causing the death of another, but one cause of action is contemplated, and the injury to the person causing the death continues to be a constituent and essential feature of the action, and has the effect of permitting an attachment of property under a statute giving the right of attachment in actions for an injury to the person by negligence or any wrongful act—Mitchell v. Talley, 109 S E 882, 182 N C 683.

Injury to property

(1) "Property," as used in the attachment statute, includes every species of estate, both real and personal, whether choate or inchoate, and is sometimes used in the sense of "estate," and the wrongful diminution of the owner's estate by fraud and deceit of another constitutes "injury to property" within the statute. So, where a nonresident relying on alleged fraud transferred land in another state for land in this state and built improvements thereon, there was an injury to property located "in this state" within the act—Ponsonby v. Sacramento Suburban Fruit Lands Co., 291 P. 167, 210 Cal 229.

(2) An action for the wrongful occupancy of premises by refusing to remove occupant's property therefrom, after permission to keep it there was revoked, was an action for "injury to property," within Civ Pract. Act § 902, specifying the actions in which attachment is authorized—Zenith Bathing Pavilion v Fair Oaks S. S Corporation, 207 N Y S. 306, 211 App Div 492, reversed on other grounds 148 N E. 532, 240 N Y. 307.

"Trespass on the case"

An action of trover is a species of action on the case, and consequently warrants the issuance of a writ of attachment under a statute authorizing such writ in aid of an action of "trespass or trespass on the case"—Wholesale Grocers Corporation v. Richheimer Brokerage Co, 233 Ill. App 64 Contra Meyer v. Meyer, 215 Ill App. 203.

"Outrageous battery" within the practice act providing for the issuance of attachment in such cases has a legislative meaning, and the act complained of must be malicious and akin to mayhem. An administrator's affidavit, alleging that defendant shot the administrator's wife, killing her instantly, establishes an "outrageous battery," within the meaning of such act—Messina v. Petroli, 167 A. 767, 11 N J.Misc. 583.

Special statutory action

An attachment writ may issue in an action to cancel an oil lease and extended by construction beyond the clear intention of the statute.[15] Under a statute authorizing attachment in "actions for the recovery of money," an attachment is authorized in tort for damages;[16] and where the legislature authorizes an attachment in all actions for the recovery of money except those for certain specified wrongs, the remedy is available in any tort action not expressly excepted.[17]

Liability criminally incurred. Under a statute allowing the remedy where defendant's liability was criminally incurred, attachment will lie in an action to recover unliquidated damages for assault and battery,[18] to recover money lost at gambling,[19] or to recover on a demand arising out of a rape on plaintiff's daughter.[20] The mere commission of a criminal offense by defendant is not, however, sufficient to warrant an attachment under such a statute, but there must also have been some damage resulting to plaintiff from such act.[21]

§ 14. —— Demand Not Liquidated

Generally, attachment will not lie where the damages claimed are so uncertain that the amount cannot be definitely stated.

The remedy by attachment is not confined to cases where a debt, in the technical sense, exists; usually it extends to every demand arising ex contractu where any fixed standard for determining the amount is supplied by the contract itself or the law acting on it,[22] and it is immaterial in such cases that the amount of the damages must be proved at the trial,[23] the fact that the damages are recover a penalty and damages for commission of a tort, under a special statute providing therefor, the general attachment statute restricting attachment to contract actions being inapplicable; and failure of the former statute to provide a form of affidavit is immaterial, in view of the code provision that, where the course of proceeding is not specifically pointed out, any suitable mode may be adopted.—Daley v. Torrey, 230 P. 782, 71 Mont. 513.

Fraud in execution or performance of contract

Under 1 Comp St (1910) p 133 § 1, authorizing the order for attachment on proof of fraud warranting an order for capias ad respondendum, and Pract.Act (1908) § 57 (3 Comp St [1910] p 4069 § 57), providing that a capias may issue where it is shown that defendant fraudulently contracted the debt or incurred the demand, a motion to vacate an order appointing an auditor and directing the giving of notice of the issuance of a writ of attachment was denied, as against the contention that, because the basis of the action was fraud in the execution or performance of the contract, the action sounded in tort and not in contract, and that the amount sought to be recovered was for unliquidated damages.—Williams & Davis v Davis, 147 A 337, 105 N J Law 542.

Specification of particular tort not controlling

Remington Code (1915) § 648 subd 9, by specifying as ground for attachment that the action is brought for injuries from the commission of some felony or for the seduction of some female, does not, by the inclusion of such torts, exclude all others from the attachment statute not limiting the causes for which an attachment may be issued, as it is one of nine independent causes.—State v. Superior Court of State of Washington, King County, 197 P. 331, 115 Wash. 359.

Alienation of affections

A writ of attachment may issue in an action for alienation of affections, wherein it was properly alleged that defendant had debauched plaintiff's wife, although the legislature has expressly excepted an action for seduction from the operation of the act.—Stockhaus v. Lind, 183 N.W. 844, 149 Minn 423.

Slander of title

"The statute, Mason's Minn.St 1927, § 9342, authorizes an attachment in all actions for the recovery of money except those for certain specified wrongs It expressly excepts from its operations actions for libel or slander, but not actions for slander of title. As actions for slander of title are not actions for defamation, but for the recovery of actual pecuniary loss resulting from malicious and groundless disparagement of title or property, they are not actions for libel or slander within the meaning of the statute, and an attachment may issue therein."—Quevli Farms of Lakefield v Union Sav Bank & Trust Co of Davenport, Iowa, 226 N W. 191, 178 Minn. 27.

Claims held sufficiently certain

(1) As plaintiff, who sued for breach of contract on which he advanced money and received nothing, could recover as damages the money so paid, the sum was certain and liquidated, so that attachment may issue.—Hamilton v. Baker-Hansen Mfg Co, 169 P. 238, 176 Cal 569

(2) Where it was necessary only to add up the items of an account to ascertain the total amount, and neither the existence of the debt nor its amount depended on any unascertained contingency, the amount was liquidated within the meaning of the attachment statutes.—Russell Co v. Wachman, 213 Ill App 348.

(3) A claim for breach of a contract to deliver a certain amount of bosh plates for a fixed amount is one for liquidated damages.—Howe v. Smeeth Copper & Bronze Co, (N.J.) 43 A. 24.

in that sense unliquidated not being determinative.[24] As a general rule, however, no attachment will lie where the contract itself does not furnish the measure of defendant's liability and the damages claimed are speculative or so uncertain that plaintiff cannot swear with any certainty to the amount that will be found due him.[25] Nevertheless, there are a number of cases in which attachment has been considered available, although the amount which plaintiff, if successful, should recover could not be definitely stated,[26] and the remedy is available, where it is expressly provided by statute, in cases involving unliquidated damages.[27]

Prospective profits

Jury question involved

A suit for damages for the failure to deliver goods pursuant to an executory contract of sale was for unliquidated damages, although plaintiff purchased from others at a higher price more than a month after the time for completion of delivery had elapsed, since whether the price paid was the fair market value at the time of delivery, and whether the goods purchased were of the same character and value as those contracted for, were questions for jury—T. Illinois statute construed and applied

(1) Under Illinois Attachment Act § 1, entitling a creditor to an attachment against the property of his debtor, and § 31, authorizing attachments in aid of actions of assumpsit, debt, covenant, trespass, or trespass on the case, when the attachment is issued in aid of a pending action, it is immaterial whether there is any relation of creditor and debtor, or any liquidated indebtedness—Hoosier Veneer Co v Trusts & Guarantee Co., (C C.A Ill) 283 F 1, certiorari denied Trusts & Guarantee Co v. Hoosier Veneer Co, 43 S Ct. 97, 260 U S 733, 67 L Ed. 489.

(2) Accordingly, attachments in aid, in assumpsit, will lie even though the damages claimed are unliquidated, as in an action for breach of a contract to marry—Yalovec v. Furcich, 229 Ill App 396.

Alienation of affections

Under Remington Code (1915) §§ 647, 648, a demand for unliquidated damages for the alienation of affections of a husband will sustain an attachment where plaintiff has made an affidavit that the amount sued for is justly due, specifying it, there being no distinction between unliquidated damages for breach of contract or for torts for the conversion of property and unliquidated damages for alienation of affections, as constituting an "indebtedness" or "debt" within § 648, requiring a showing that defendant is indebted to plaintiff—State v. Superior Court of State of Washington, King County, 197 P. 321, 115 Wash. 359.

Against nonresident

The issuance of the writ of attachment against defendants, nonresidents, on an unliquidated claim, is authorized in Louisiana under the provisions of Act (1920) No. 215 which declares: "That in all suits instituted in any of the courts of this state, in which the demand is for damages arising from an offense, quasi offense or tort, where the defendant . . . is a non-resident of the state . . . the plaintiff shall have the right to sue out an attachment against the property of the defendant upon making affidavit and giving bond as now required by law in suits against non-resident defendants for other causes of action"—Yates v. Demand held matured

(1) After a settlement by sales agents with a contractor for the royalty accruing to them under the terms of a contract, and releasing him from further liability thereon and accepting in lieu thereof the obligation of the city for whom the work was done, the compensation to which they were entitled under the contract became due so as to authorize an attachment therefor—

upon such a demand without statutory authority, it is void.[29] It has been held, however, that in an action for breach of contract of employment, an attachment may be granted for the balance of the salary due or to become due under the contract.[30]

(2) Rescission of Contract by Plaintiff

Where plaintiff rightfully rescinds a contract he may in a proper case resort to attachment notwithstanding the immaturity of the rescinded contract.

Where a party to a contract not yet matured is guilty of fraud or other conduct entitling the other party to rescind, and the latter does rescind, a cause of action arises in his favor which is immediately enforceable, and if such cause of action, left to plaintiff after rescission, is of a nature to warrant the issue of an attachment, he may resort to that remedy, notwithstanding the immaturity of the rescinded contract.[31]

b. Statutes Authorizing Attachment

(1) In general
(2) Joinder of demands due and demands not due

(1) In General

Statutes allowing attachment in the case of immature demands are strictly construed, and the remedy is available only as to such demands and to the extent that the statute contemplates.

In a number of states provision has been made by statute for the issue of attachments in certain cases where the demand sued on is not yet due, and in such cases plaintiff can proceed in attachment as though the debt were matured.[32] Such statutes usually limit the remedy on such demands within specified limits prescribing the conditions which must exist to authorize it, and where the grounds on which the attachment may issue in this class of cases are specially enumerated, the remedy is available only where one or more of the specified grounds exists.[33]

Although under some statutes it seems that the case may proceed to final judgment but that execution upon the judgment shall be stayed until the debt is due,[34] generally the proceedings can go no further before maturity of the debt than to create a lien, and no final judgment can be rendered until after maturity of the demand,[35] and as the power to attach furnishes the only authority to sue on a demand not due, it follows that if the attachment is invalid the action must abate,[36] while if the issue of an attachment is discretionary with the court or judge, and an attachment is refused, the action must be dismissed.[37]

Statutes allowing attachment before the debt has become due are not applicable to attachments based on matured obligations.[38]

Intent to defraud creditors

Action dependent upon attachment

In order to bring suit upon notes and mortgages before maturity on the ground of fraud under a statute, providing that when the debt was incurred for property obtained under false pretenses a creditor may sue on a claim before it is due and have attachment against debtor's property, it is necessary to have attachments of the debtor's property issued, the purpose of the statute being not to allow the bringing of an action before the debt is due, but to provide the means whereby a creditor might protect himself by getting his property into the custody of the court, to be held to secure such judgment as might eventually be rendered—Birken v. Hickey, 176 N.W. 137, 42 S.D. 472.

sidered that the rule stated supra § 4 b (1) requiring attachment proceedings to be confined strictly within the limits of the statute by which they are authorized is especially applicable to a case where the debt in aid of which the remedy is sought is not due.[39]

(2) Joinder of Demands Due and Demands Not Due

Attachment may, under some statutes, issue for the aggregate amount of demands due and demands not due.

Under some statutes it is held that a debt not due may be joined with one that is due, and an attachment be issued for the aggregate amount, where grounds of attachment applicable to both debts are stated in the affidavit.[40]

§ 16. —— Contingent Demand

Attachment is not available where plaintiff's claim is not fixed and depends on a contingency which may never happen.

In order to warrant attachment upon a demand not matured, the debt must be one which will certainly become due in the future, and accordingly the remedy is not available where the indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff depends upon a contingency which may never happen,[41] nor will the improper issue of an attachment on such a demand be cured by the subsequent happening of the contingency which fixes defendant's liability.[42]

Fixed indebtedness subject to be defeated. The rule just stated applies only where the happening of a contingency is a prerequisite to the fixing of an absolute indebtedness, and does not prevent attachment upon an indebtedness which has already become fixed merely because it may be reduced or defeated in the event of the happening of a certain contingency;[43] and so where the contingency was to take place at the expiration of the contract, and plaintiff set forth the contract, which showed that defendant had breached the contract and rendered it terminated, and stated in his affidavit that defendant was justly indebted, the court erred in abating the attachment on the ground that it was levied on a contingency.[44]

§ 17. —— Demand Otherwise Secured

a. In general
b. Statutes limiting right

a. In General

In absence of statutes to the contrary the right to attachment is not defeated by the fact that the demand in suit is otherwise secured.

In the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, the fact that a demand is otherwise secured will not prevent the issuance of an attachment in aid of an action thereon,[45] and accordingly the fact that a landlord has a lien for his rent does not preclude him from proceeding by attachment,[46] and a creditor whose claim is secured by a mortgage on personal property may waive his lien under the mortgage and maintain attachment against the debtor's property.[47]

In some jurisdictions it is held that the creditor must elect whether he will proceed by attachment or sustain his rights by virtue of the security,[48] but there is authority to the effect that he need not waive his security to avail himself of the remedy of attachment.[49]

In Washington

(1) Under Ballinger Codes & St Annot § 5893, made applicable to chattel mortgage foreclosures by § 5879, and providing that plaintiff shall not prosecute any other action for the same matter while he is foreclosing his mortgage, and § 5351, requiring the affidavit for attachment to specify the amount of indebtedness, plaintiff in an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage may not have a writ of attachment issued against additional property before judgment, although an attachment is an ancillary proceeding, the intent of § 5893 being to prevent a mortgagee securing an additional remedy in anticipation of a deficiency judgment, while looking to the mortgage security, and before exhausting the same, and it being impossible for plaintiff, prior to a deficiency judgment, to state in his affidavit the amount of indebtedness, that is, the deficiency.—Advance Thresher Co. v. Schimke, 91 P. 645, 47 Wash. 162.

(2) The statute does not, however, prevent a lienholder from using the remedy of attachment to seize the property on which his lien was being foreclosed.—Market Operating

Where parties agree upon security for a debt, such security will not be presumed to be of value sufficient to support such debt, preventing resort to attachment proceedings,[50] and plaintiff seeking foreclosure of a trust deed is not required to show the value of the existing security and to limit an additionally sought attachment on an unencumbered tract to the deficiency in the existing security.[51]

b. Statutes Limiting Right

To preclude an attachment under statutes denying the right where plaintiff's claim is secured, the security must be of the kind contemplated by statute.

In some jurisdictions, the statutes deny the right to proceed by attachment to a creditor whose demand is secured by mortgage, lien, pledge, or otherwise; but in order that such a provision should preclude an attachment, the security given must be of the kind contemplated by the statute,[52] valid,[53] and of a fixed, determinate character, capable of

Circumstances not precluding remedy

In an action to enforce a stockholder's liability, based on the corporation's issuance of negotiable warehouse receipts, plaintiff's right to attachment against the stockholder's property is not barred by reason of having filed a claim in bankruptcy court or because a bond covered warehousemen's liability.—W. Fine & Son v. Hall, (Cal.App.) 21 P.(2d) 697.

Assignment for benefit of creditors

Where a statute provides, among other things, that an attachment may issue, if the party applying for the same is not secured by mortgage, lien, or pledge upon real or personal property, a creditor of an insolvent, after consenting to an assignment by him of all his property for the benefit of creditors under which he is a preferred creditor, and certain to receive his proportion of property assigned, cannot, without attacking the assignment for fraud or otherwise, procure an attachment against the insolvent's property. An assignment under such circumstances is the very best security a creditor may have.—Elling v. Kirkpatrick, 9 P. 900, 6 Mont. 119.

Stockholder of mortgagor corporation

(1) The liability of a stockholder, arising under Const. art. 12 § 3, and Civ.Code § 322, declaring him individually and personally liable for his proportion of every debt contracted by the corporation during the time he is a stockholder, is one on the contract of the stockholder, arising from his implied offer when he becomes a stockholder, accepted by the creditor when he extends credit, and is direct, primary, and independent of that of the corporation, and so unsecured by mortgage, although the corporation's debt is so secured, so that in an action thereon the stockholder's property may be attached.—Aronson & Co. v. Pearson, 249 P. 188, 199 Cal. 286, 51 A.L.R. 1380—6 C.J. p. 87 note 57 [f] Contra Foreign Mines Dev. Co. v. Boyes, (C.C.Cal.) 180 F. 594.

(2) The fact that the stockholder owns all but three of corporation's five thousand shares does not make him and it the same entity and its mortgage his, and so prevent attachment in the creditor's action on his stockholder's liability.—Aronson & Co. v. Pearson, 249 P. 188, 199 Cal. 286, 51 A.L.R. 1380.

Retention of title by vendor or seller

(1) Code Civ.Proc. § 537, prohibiting attachments to enforce obligations secured by a mortgage, lien, or pledge unless such security has become valueless, etc., contemplates only the forms of security therein named, and does not preclude attachment by the seller of an automobile under a contract by which he retained title and right to retake possession upon default in payment, since such contract does not create a "mortgage," nor is it a "lien" or a "pledge."—Standard Auto Sales Co. v. Lehman, 186 P. 178, 43 Cal.App. 763.

(2) So where plaintiff and defendant entered into an executory contract of sale, under which plaintiff retained title until defendant had complied with the terms thereof, as plaintiff retained title, he had no lien, and in an action by plaintiff on purchase-money note, it not being secured by a mortgage or lien on the property, plaintiff was entitled to a writ of attachment.—Smith v. Bunston, 234 P. 836, 72 Mont. 535.

(3) It has been held, however, that a vendor of land retaining title until all payments should be made had security at least equal to that of a vendor's lien or mortgage, and, in his action to recover unpaid installments, was not entitled to attach defendant's personal property.—Richvale Land Co. v. Johnson, 152 P. 212, 28 Cal.App. 296.

(4) A vendor under an executory land contract, having retained title as security for purchase price, is not entitled to an attachment in an action for balance due.—Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Stahler, (Cal.App.) 59 P.(2d) 515—6 C.J. p. 87 note 56 [d] (1).

Equitable lien

Where plaintiffs, alleging rescission of a land purchase contract in pais, sought return of the money paid by them because of alleged fraud and partial failure of consideration, they were not entitled to attachment in the absence of a showing that their equitable lien arising out of the fraud was or had become valueless.—McCall v. Superior Court in and for Imperial County, (Cal.) 36 P.(2d) 642.

Pledge

Under Rev.Codes §§ 6656, 6657, authorizing an attachment in an action on contract, etc., where the contract is not secured by any pledge, etc., of personal property, or where such security has become valueless, an instrument transferring accounts from a debtor to a creditor with authority to collect them and apply the proceeds on the indebtedness and naming a third person to collect the accounts and remit sixty-five per cent to the creditor, and thirty-five per cent to the debtor, but reserving to both parties the right to collect accounts, constituted a "pledge" securing payment of the indebtedness; and hence an attachment could not be sustained on an affidavit reciting that the claim was not and never had been secured by any mortgage, lien, or pledge, although under § 5776 the lien of a pledge depends on possession, especially as § 5794 apparently recognizes constructive delivery of property not capable of manual delivery.—Savage Tire Sales Co. v. Stuart, 203 P. 364, 61 Mont. 524.

53. Bowman v. Wade, 103 P. 72, 54 Or. 347—6 C.J. p. 87 note 58.

Void or insufficient mortgage

Plaintiff, suing on a note, may obtain an attachment, notwithstanding the statute, where a chattel mortgage securing the note is void, being enforced with certainty and depending on no conditions.[54]

§ 18. —— Statutory Liability

Attachment will lie in a suit to enforce a statutory liability only when the demand is one contemplated by the attachment statute.

Where defendant's liability to plaintiff arises purely from statute it is not ordinarily regarded as a demand on which an attachment will lie under a statute authorizing the remedy only on causes arising out of contract, express or implied,[55] but, where the demand is regarded as arising on contract as well as by virtue of the statute, attachment will lie.[56] Under a statute authorizing attachment for "any money demand" the remedy will lie on a statutory penalty where the amount is fixed or can be certainly ascertained.[57] Under United States Revised Statutes § 915 (28 U.S.C.A. § 726), providing that in common-law causes in the district courts plaintiff shall be entitled to similar remedies by way of attachment as are provided by the laws of the state in which such court is held for the courts thereof, a federal district court sitting as a common-law court, as distinguished from an admiralty or an equity court, may authorize the issuance of a writ of attachment in causes of action arising under statutes as well as in causes arising under the common law,[58] although there is also authority for a more narrow construction limiting the right of attachment to causes of action arising under the common law.[59]

§ 19. —— Joining Cause Not Authorizing with One Authorizing Attachment

Plaintiff cannot obtain an attachment covering both claims contemplated by the statute and claims not within its scope.

A party holding a claim on which attachment lies cannot join with it another claim on which the remedy will not lie and then obtain an attachment covering both,[60] and if an attachment is obtained under such circumstances it may be dissolved in toto.[61] The mere fact that plaintiff has demanded in his complaint other sums than those for which an attachment will lie but for which no attachment is asked, however, does not affect his right to the attachment, since the indebtedness set up in the affidavit need not include all the damages claimed in the complaint.[62]

Failure to file annual report

An action by a corporation's creditor against a director under Rev Codes (1921) § 6003, making the director liable for the corporation's debts on failure to make and file an annual financial report, is not an "action upon a contract express or implied," within Rev Codes (1921) §§ 9256, 9257, authorizing issuance of an attachment in such an action, the action being one to recover a statutory penalty—Butler v. Peters, 205 P. 247, 62 Mont. 381, 26 A.L.R. 560.

Illegal distribution of corporate assets

An action by a corporation to enforce the liability prescribed by statute for illegally distributing its assets to stockholders is not an action on a contract, express or implied—Talcott Land Co. v Hershiser, 195 P. 653, 184 Cal. 748

Violation of anti-trust law

An attachment will not lie in a suit by the attorney-general against a nonresident to recover penalties for violating the anti-trust laws under a statute providing that an attachment shall not be granted against a nonresident except on a debt or demand arising on contract.—State v Ehle, 166 S.W. 535, 112 Ark. 385.

Infringement of copyright

Since no authority exists in the United States for obtaining a copyright beyond the extent to which congress has authorized it, a suit for infringement of a copyright is not a "common-law cause" in which plaintiff is entitled to an attachment—Dixon v. In New Jersey the decisions distinguish between quashing the writ which ends the suit, and releasing property unlawfully attached under it, and where part of plaintiff's demand is for unliquidated, and part for liquidated, damages, after defendant enters a general appearance, the writ cannot be quashed, but the proper remedy is to have the attached property released from any lien for the claim so far as it was one for unliquidated damages—Laura v. § 20. Persons Entitled

a. In general
b. Foreigners and nonresidents
c. Debtor against himself

a. In General

Generally any creditor who has not agreed to forbear pressing his claim, whether he is the original creditor or has succeeded by assignment to the rights of others, or whether he is the plaintiff or the defendant in the action before the court, is entitled, where proper grounds exist, to the issuance of an attachment.

The right to process of attachment is ordinarily given to creditors alone[63] As a rule, however, when proper statutory grounds for the issuance of an attachment exist, any creditor is held to be entitled to the remedy,[64] regardless of whether he is an original creditor whose claim arises out of transactions between himself and the debtor or has succeeded by assignment or otherwise to the claim of a third person against the debtor[65] Where, however, plaintiff, who sued out the writ for his sole benefit, was not sole owner of the cause of action sued on, the writ of attachment must be quashed and vacated,[66] and since a suit cannot be maintained in equity in the name of one party for the use of another, an attachment in equity on a claim owned jointly by plaintiff and another will be limited to the interest of plaintiff.[67]

Assignee of debt fraudulently contracted. Where the common-law principle that such fraud is personal to the contracting parties and does not follow the assignment is still in force, the assignee of a debt fraudulently contracted is not entitled to an attachment against the debtor,[68] but the rule is otherwise where the underlying principle has been abrogated;[69] and the rule first stated in this paragraph is not applicable where the assignee is not the owner of the claim by purchase, but for the purpose of collection only, since the assignor still has a beneficial interest in it carrying the right of attachment into the hands of his assignee.[70]

A surety suing the principal to compel him to discharge the debt or to give indemnity may have an attachment against the principal, notwithstanding there is an action pending against him and his principal seeking a common-law judgment against them for the debt.[71]

Under counterclaim or cross complaint. A defendant who interposes a counterclaim or cross petition may, under the code practice, enforce it by attachment, although the statute in terms gives the right only to "plaintiff," the word being there used in the sense of "claimant" or "moving party."[72] So a defendant in interpleader filing a cross complaint against plaintiff may attach the fund in dispute.[73]

Agreement for forbearance. Where a creditor expressly agrees, upon sufficient consideration, to take no step to collect his debt within a given time, he cannot maintain an attachment thereon within the time specified.[74]

b. Foreigners and Nonresidents

Subject to prevailing statutory provisions, the right to an attachment is not ordinarily affected by questions of citizenship or residence.

Under statutes so providing the right to proceed by process of attachment may be limited to a citizen of the state or to a citizen of some other of the United States,[75] but as a rule at the present time the right is not ordinarily affected by the question of citizenship.[76] So although the right to invoke the remedy is, in some states, restricted within narrower limits in the case of a nonresident than in that of a resident,[77] generally the remedy is available to nonresident creditors.[78] The exercise of the right by a nonresident will not, however, be permitted to prejudice domestic creditors.[79]

Cross petition against codefendant

c. Debtor against Himself

Under some circumstances a debtor may attach his own property for the benefit of a creditor.

In some states, in the absence of fraud, a debtor may attach his own property for the benefit of a creditor, where authority has been given him so to do, or where there has been a subsequent ratification of his act by the creditor, and such attachment is binding on subsequently attaching creditors.[80]

§ 21. Persons Liable

a In general
b. Women
c. Persons under disability
d Persons in fiduciary capacity
e. Devisees

a. In General

Attachment is available against any natural or artificial person contemplated by the attachment statutes.

The remedy by attachment is available only against the property of persons natural or artificial,[81] and, as a general rule, the party against whom an attachment is available must stand in the relation of debtor to the plaintiff in the action.[82] However, where the statutes so provide, the property of all persons and corporations other than those excepted may be subject to attachment.[83] Under a statute authorizing attachment only in actions against a natural person or a domestic or foreign corporation, an attachment may issue in an action against an unincorporated association sued in the name of its president.[84] Enforcement of the remedy will not ordinarily be denied solely because defendant is a nonresident,[85] alien,[86] or foreigner,[87] but an attachment issued against a deceased person is void,[88] and a person in the naval service of the United States is not within a statute exempting soldiers in the actual military service from the process.[89]

Wife of debtor
In an action against husband and wife on a contract binding only the husband, it was not error to carry an attachment running against both husband and wife into the judgment where it was levied on community property alone, since in such a case it was not necessary to name the wife as a party to the attachment—Godefroy v. Where, as is usually the case, the attachment is merely an ancillary remedy and its object is to obtain security for such judgment as may be rendered, it may properly issue, although personal service is also had on defendant;[90] but, if the statute authorizing attachment limits the remedy to cases where defendant is beyond the reach of ordinary process, it will not lie against a debtor who can be personally served,[91] although the fact that it becomes practicable after issue and service of the writ to give personal notice to defendant will not deprive plaintiff of his remedy by attachment.[92] A foreign attachment is available only against a nonresident.[93]

b. Women

Women are exempt from attachment under statutes exempting them from arrest in civil actions or being held in bail where the attachment acts presuppose the power so to treat the defendant.

In the absence of an express provision making the attachment law applicable to women, it has been held that they are exempt from its operation in a jurisdiction in which they cannot be held to bail and where a defendant in attachment cannot defend without putting in special bail,[94] and that, in a jurisdiction where it is unlawful to arrest a female in a civil action, an attachment cannot be had against a female under a statute authorizing an order by a commissioner of a writ of attachment where a capias ad respondendum might issue.[95]

c. Persons under Disability

(1) Infants
(2) Lunatics

(1) Infants

Unless specially exempted, infants are liable to attachment.

In the absence of a provision to the contrary an attachment may be had against the property of an infant.[96]

(2) Lunatics

Lunatics are subject to attachment except where the ground thereof necessitates a mental attitude of which the defendant is incapable.

Inasmuch as a personal suit at law can be maintained against a lunatic, there is no reason why an attachment may not, in a proper case, be issued against him, and in such case the conservator is not a necessary or proper party to the proceedings.[97] When, however, the ground for the attachment necessitates a certain mental attitude, for example, an intent to defraud creditors, it is a defense to show that defendant was insane and therefore incapable of such attitude.[98]

d. Persons in Fiduciary Capacity

(1) Executors and administrators
(2) Guardians
(3) Trustees

(1) Executors and Administrators

Although attachment is proper where a personal liability of executors and administrators is being enforced, it is, in the absence of statutory authority, inappropriate to enforce a demand against a decedent's estate.

The remedy of a creditor by attachment being obviously inconsistent with the usual administration of the assets of an estate, it is not, in the absence of express statutory authorization, available against an executor or administrator with respect to a demand against the estate of the decedent.[99] Such proceeding is, however, sometimes authorized by statute under which the process may issue against personal representatives in all cases which are within the purview of the act.[1] in the course of administration, an attachment is permissible if the grounds therefor exist.[2]

(2) Guardians

A guardian ordinarily cannot be proceeded against as such by attachment.

As a guardian holds the property of his ward in a representative capacity, he is not, as a general rule, liable to be proceeded against as such by attachment.[3]

(3) Trustees

Attachment will not issue against trustees as such.

An attachment ordinarily will not issue against a trustee in his representative capacity.[4]

e. Devisees

Attachment may in some instances lie against the devisees for a debt of their testator.

Attachment lies against a devisee for a debt of the testator only when the latter was liable to attachment therefor at the time of his death.[5]

§ 22. —— Joint Debtors or Codefendants

a. In general
b. Effect of solvency of codebtor

a. In General

Ordinarily a party may pursue the remedy of attachment against one of several joint debtors or codefendants without including the others.

While the statutes regulating attachments against joint obligors are not uniform, and a contrary result has been reached under some of them,[6] it is usually permissible to pursue the remedy against a part, without including all, where the ground for attachment exists as to some, but not as to others,[7] or where it is to the creditor's interest to proceed against one or a part of the debtors only;[8] and so where a warrant is granted against several defendants, the fact that it was not justified as against some of them does not vitiate it as against those as to whom it was justified.[9]

A surety undertakes to pay the debt of his principal, and does it with the knowledge that the law will authorize an attachment against his property if his principal does any of the acts which the law declares shall authorize such a proceeding.[10]

In a proper case it seems that plaintiff may have an attachment in an action brought in the alternative against several defendants,[11] but to justify the issuance of a warrant against defendants sued in the alternative, the evidence must be such as would sustain the warrant if each had been separately sued instead of all of them together; mere rumor and suspicion connecting one of the parties sued with the cause of action does not justify issuance of the warrant against him.[12]

Cross action against codefendant. A party joined as a defendant who files a cross petition against his codefendant is entitled, on a proper showing, to have an attachment issued against the property of his codefendant.[13]

b. Effect of Solvency of Codebtor

The solvency of the defendant's coobligors does not affect the plaintiff's right to proceed in attachment against the defendant.

The mere fact that a defendant's coöbligors are solvent does not affect plaintiff's right to proceed against such defendant by attachment.[14]

II. GROUNDS OF ATTACHMENT

§ 23. In General

Attachment is available only when a statutory ground exists.

Attachment, being a purely statutory remedy, is available only where one or more of the grounds enumerated in the statute exist[15] at the time when the writ is sued out,[16] and, if the writ is issued without statutory authority, no valid lien is created, even though the proceedings are sufficient in form and substance and the levy properly made.[17]

§ 24. Absconding, Absence or Concealment

a. In general
b. Against whom ground available
c. Intent

a. In General

That the debtor has absconded or absents or conceals himself with the intent to defraud creditors is a ground for attachment under some statutes

An attachment may issue on the ground that the debtor has absconded, or absents himself, or keeps himself concealed for the purpose of defrauding his creditors or avoiding service of process, where the statutes so provide,[18] and where the departure of defendant from the state is relied on as ground for attachment, it is not necessary to show that plaintiff is in danger of losing his claim.[19]

b. Against Whom Ground Available

(1) Resident or nonresident debtors
(2) Indorser or surety

(1) Resident or Nonresident Debtors

Generally the ground is held to apply only to residents of the state.

While there is authority for the view that a nonresident of a state may be an absconder from the state,[20] the statutes in question are usually held to apply only to debtors who are residents of the state and not to nonresident debtors;[21] and although the attachment act provides that attachment may issue where plaintiff or agent shall make affidavit that he verily believes the debtor absconds from his creditors, "and" is not, to deponent's knowledge or belief, resident in the state at the time, an absconding person is liable, although a resident in the state.[22]

(2) Indorser or Surety

Attachment is available against an absconding surety or a surety not participating in the fraud where the principal has absconded.

If a surety has left the jurisdiction, his property may be attached, although the principal remains within the jurisdiction.[23] Moreover the absence of the principal from the state to avoid the service of process has been held a ground for an attachment against an indorser or surety not absent from the state or participating in any fraud.[24]

c. Intent

Where intent is a necessary element it must appear, although it may be inferred from the circumstances

If by statute an intent to avoid service of process or defraud creditors is a necessary element of the concealment or absence which is a ground for attachment, such intent must appear,[25] and the process cannot issue where the debtor left the Possibility of fruitless recovery

(1) The Kentucky statutes contemplate the remedy of attachment in every situation where plaintiff's ultimate recovery might otherwise be made fruitless by defendant's acts —Garnett v. Oliver, 45 S.W.(2d) 815, 242 Ky. 25.

(2) Accordingly, the right of a landlord to an attachment against his tenant depends on whether he has reasonable grounds to believe that his debt will be lost unless an attachment issues.—Mattingly v. Mattingly, 8 Ky.Op. 777.

Reasonable cause required

Attachment is a drastic remedy, which should not be permitted without reasonable cause, particularly when personal property, seizure of which would cause considerable injury, is levied on.—Hogue v. McAllister, 210 P. 671, 122 Wash. 347.

Actual existence of facts

Plaintiff's right in attachment to the issue of the writ is dependent upon the actual existence of the facts for which the attachment writ issues.—Melvin v. Scowley, 104 So. 817, 213 Ala. 414.

Subsequent events

An attachment writ must stand or fall upon the state of facts existing at the date of issuance, and cannot be cured by subsequent events.—Ansman v. Nagle, 143 So. 885, 177 La. 583—6 C.J. p 43 note 10 [a], [b].

state while insane,[26] nor does flight to escape a criminal prosecution or arrest justify an attachment, under one view,[27] although it has been held that where such flight has the effect of preventing the service of summons to answer in a civil action for the same wrong, the creditor is entitled to his attachment,[28] and that where the statute authorizes an attachment against any one who "secretes himself so that the ordinary process of law cannot be served on him," an attachment may issue against one who so secretes himself, although solely to avoid a criminal prosecution.[29]

Intent may be inferred. In all cases where the intent is a necessary element it may be presumed from the various circumstances and incidents attending the debtor's absence or departure.[30]

§ 25. —— What Constitutes Absconding

"Absconding" as used in the attachment statutes means hiding or absenting oneself clandestinely to avoid service of legal process.

Where the term "absconding debtor" is defined by statute, the statutory definition should be applied in recognition and pursuit of the purpose of the attachment law to enable a creditor, by seizing the property of a debtor to compel his appearance to answer the creditor's demands.[31] A party absconds in a legal sense when he hides, conceals, or absents himself clandestinely, with the intent to avoid the service of legal process.[32]

Absence from the state does not, of itself, amount to absconding;[33] nor, on the other hand, is it necessary that the debtor should leave the limits of the state in order to become an absconder.[34]

Open and notorious departure usually negatives the intention necessary to constitute an absconding,[35] but it has been held nevertheless that one may depart openly and still abscond if the required intent is made out.[36]

§ 26. —— Nature of Absence

a. Absence from state
b. Temporary absence
c. Enticement out of state
d. Establishment of new residence

a. Absence from State

Where the statutes require absence from the state, absence from the county does not warrant the relief, although mere delay in leaving the state does not defeat it.

Where the statutes authorize attachment only in case the debtor absents himself from the state, his mere absence from the county is not ground for attachment,[37] but the remedy should be granted where he actually consummates his intention of leaving the state although after a delay.[38]

b. Temporary Absence

Mere temporary absence does not authorize an attachment.

It is not the purpose of the attachment statutes that a debtor should be at all times physically present in the state or else be subject to have his property seized under attachment, and hence it is generally held that an attachment is authorized only by an absence of a permanent nature and not by a mere temporary absence for the purpose of business, health, or pleasure, although during such temporary absence an officer armed with a writ could not serve it on him,[39] or although the debtor does not inform his creditors of his absence.[40] When service can be had on defendant in ample time for due return on the writ, that is sufficient, and there is no ground for attachment on account of his absence.[41] A person has "removed himself out

41. Martin v. Barrett, (Mo. App.) 204 S.W. 410.
"Mere absence from the state, coupled with the fact that the creditor does not know where the defendant is, does not authorize attachment against the defendant, if process may be served under the provisions of section 2933, Hemingway's Code (section 3926, Code of 1906). To authorize attachment because of removal from the state, or absence from domicile, there must be an inability to serve the summons in the manner provided by law to obtain jurisdiction of the of the state," within the meaning of the attachment act, however, when he is absent therefrom with no definite intention of returning thereto.[42]

Military service. A debtor who leaves his residence in order to enter the military service of his country is not within the attachment law,[43] but it has been held otherwise as to one who leaves for the purpose of joining a hostile army.[44]

c. Enticement out of State

An attachment grounded on absence from the state is unwarranted where the debtor was enticed out in order to afford the grounds.

An attachment on the ground of the debtor's absence from the state cannot be sustained where he was enticed out of the state in order that his property might be seized.[45]

d. Establishment of New Residence

Establishment of a new residence is not necessary to authorize the remedy.

Where the statute makes removal out of the state ground for attachment, it is not necessary that the debtor should have determined upon a new residence or home elsewhere.[46]

§ 27. —— What Constitutes Concealment

A debtor's voluntary act of secreting himself to avoid service of process constitutes a concealment within the attachment statutes.

To authorize an attachment because of the concealment of the debtor it must appear that there was an intent to avoid service of process, and that the concealment was voluntary;[47] but the duration of the concealment is immaterial.[48] There is a concealment where the debtor secretes or shuts himself up, whether at his place of abode, or elsewhere either in or out of the county of his residence;[49] but a mere refusal to see callers is not concealment.[50] Permanent residence out of the county is not concealment,[51] but there is concealment where the debtor requests false information to be given as to his movements after his departure.[52]

Concealment preceding indebtedness The acts relied upon as constituting a concealment usually must follow the accrual of indebtedness, and if the alleged concealment precedes the indebtedness, it does not come within the terms of the attachment statute, unless it be proved that it was merely a step in a fraudulent scheme to defraud creditors.[53]

§ 28. —— Intended Departure

Attachment will lie, under statutory authority, where it is shown that a debtor, to defraud his creditors, intends to depart from the state.

The statutes very generally permit an attachment where the debtor intends to abscond or depart from the state, and where an intended departure is shown the remedy will lie,[54] but such intention is not sufficient where the language of the statute is such as to show a legislative intent that the remedy shall be available only where the absconding or departure has become an accomplished fact;[55] and

Fraudulent purpose

The term "concealment" implies an act designed to accomplish a fraudulent purpose—Morelli v. Thombs, 172 N.E 331, 35 Ohio App. 233.

Facts showing concealment

(1) Defendant withdrew from his business about seventy-seven hundred dollars in cash, stating to his partner that he would return it in a short time, and that he needed it for a real estate transaction The defendant, however, appropriated seven hundred dollars to his own use, and divided what was left between his wife his mother and his brother-in-law, giving forty-two hundred dollars in cash to his wife Defendant, having left his office with this seventy-seven hundred dollars, did not return to his office that day or the following day Later defendant met some of his creditors, his partner and counsel and made an agreement to meet his creditors again at eleven o'clock. His partner accompanied him, but defendant eluded his partner and has not returned to his residence Afterward defendant notified some of his creditors of his address, but others were unable to find him It was held that defendant concealed himself to defraud his creditors—Ninth Nat Bank v. Sonneborn, 9 Pa Dist. 741.

(2) Where the debtor left the county of his residence and so concealed himself that a summons could not be served upon him, there is a concealment within the meaning of the statute—Miller's Ex'x v People's Bank, 41 S.W.(2d) 1096, 240 Ky 185

an attachment will not lie where defendant has appeared in the case.[56] Under some statutes the gist of the action is held to be the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and an attachment will not be granted where the debtor acts for a lawful and legitimate purpose.[57]

In an action on the joint obligation of a husband and wife it is sufficient to warrant an attachment that the husband had formed the intention to leave the state although there was no such intention on the part of the wife.[58]

§ 29. Nonresidence

Where nonresidence is made a ground for attachment by statute, the fact of nonresidence is itself sufficient to warrant the remedy in actions on claims contemplated by the attachment act.

The statutes very generally make it a ground of attachment that the debtor is a nonresident of the state where the action is instituted, although some of them limit it to such nonresidents as have designated no agent to receive service of process for them within the state.

Under such statutes where the cause of action is on a claim contemplated by the act,[59] the fact that the debtor is a nonresident, together with the fact, when this is made a condition to the remedy, that he has designated no one to accept service of process for him within the state, is of itself sufficient to warrant the attachment,[60] and it is not necessary to show that defendant has or had any intent to defraud,[61] that plaintiff is in danger of losing his debt,[62] that defendant is a resident elsewhere,[63] or that it is impossible to serve process on defendant in the state of his residence[64] or the state where the action is brought,[65] nor does the fact that defendant was personally served defeat the right to attachment.[66] So it has been held that an attachment on this ground may be obtained, although the nonresident is present in the state where the attachment is sought;[67] but in some jurisdictions the rule is that actual absence from the jurisdiction is essential to the validity of the writ.[68] Transferring to a resident an undivided interest in property will not deprive the creditor of his right to attachment against the interest of a nonresident.[69] Where the statute giving the right provides that it shall not apply where the nonresident defendant has appointed an agent in the state upon whom process may be served, the right is not defeated, as against a nonresident motorist, by another statute providing that the operation of a motor vehicle on the state highways by a nonresi-

"In which attachment is"

Under a statute providing that it is a sufficient ground for attachment that defendant is a nonresident of the state and has estate within the county or city "in which the attachment is," the quoted words mean "in which attachment proceeding is instituted" and not "in which the writ of attachment is levied or served"—Winfree v. Mann, 153 S.E 837, 154 Va 683.

Immunity from service

The fact that defendant was present in the county as a witness in attendance upon court, and, therefore, privileged from service of process, does not change the effect of his presence and make the attachment valid—Wight v. Hovey, 17 Pa.Dist 1019.

Time of issuance

In order to avoid an attachment on the ground that defendant was not absent, he must show his presence in the jurisdiction at the precise time when the writ was issued—Melchoir v Stewart, 42 Pa.Co. 366—6 C.J. p 48 note 58 [c] (2).

69. Stevenson v. Prather, 23 La. Ann. 434.

dent constitutes an appointment of the secretary of state as his attorney for the service of process.[70]

Nonresidence in the county in which the action is brought is not, unless the statute so provides, a ground of attachment,[71] although property of a nonresident of a county may be attached where the statutes specifically authorize the remedy in such cases.[72]

§ 30. —— In Case of Joint Debtors

Attachment will not usually issue against the joint or partnership property of creditors, unless all are nonresidents, although the individual property of the nonresident may be attached.

An attachment on the ground of nonresidence will not ordinarily issue against partnership property, where only one or a part of the partners resides without the state,[73] but, although a contrary view has been taken,[74] it is usually held that the individual property of a nonresident joint debtor may be attached, although his codebtor is a resident of the state.[75]

§ 31. —— Time at Which Ground Must Exist

To be ground for attachment, nonresidence must exist when the writ issues.

The nonresidence which is a ground for attachment is that existing at the time when the writ is issued.[76] If that is made to appear, the fact that defendant was previously a resident of the state will not prevent the attachment,[77] nor does the fact that defendant subsequently becomes a resident of the state require that the attachment be dissolved.[78]

§ 32. —— What Constitutes Residence or Nonresidence

a. In general
b. Place of abode
c. Residence and domicile distinguished
d. Residence and place of business distinguished
e. Intention as bearing on question of residence

a. In General

The question of whether defendant is a resident depends on the facts and circumstances of each case.

In determining the question of residence, it is impossible, in the last analysis, to lay down any fixed and unalterable rule which will govern in all cases; but the question whether one is, or is not, a resident within the meaning of the attachment statutes must be determined according to the facts and circumstances in each individual case.[79] The general rules stated in the following paragraphs, however, are useful as aids in deciding the matter in any particular case.

b. Place of Abode

Residence is a place of abode either of a temporary or permanent character.

Residence is a place of abode and the location of one's fixed place of abode is an important, if not conclusive, consideration in determining his residence.[80] To be a resident the debtor must have a place of abode in the state, either of a temporary or permanent character, at which a service of summons may lawfully be made,[81] and the lack of such place of abode renders one a nonresident.[82] Mere casual visits for personal reasons or regular business trips in a state do not make a person a resident thereof.[83]

The place of residence of a man's family is prima facie his residence.[84]

c. Residence and Domicile Distinguished

Attachment statutes contemplate actual residence only, without regard to domicile which, besides residence, embraces an intention to remain.

While the term "residence" as used in the attachment acts is sometimes considered as synonymous, with "domicile"[85] they are not, when accurately used, convertible terms,[86] for, to constitute domicile, two things must concur, the fact of residence and an intention to remain.[87] Attachment statutes contemplate actual residence without regard to domicile,[88] and a person may, with regard to the application of an attachment statute, have his domicile in one state and his residence in another.[89] Accordingly, an actual resident with a foreign domicile is not subject to attachment as a nonresident,[90] and the fact that a resident is an alien temporarily within this country and incapable under the immigration laws of becoming an American citizen does not render him subject to attachment.[91]

d. Residence and Place of Business Distinguished

A place of business does not of itself constitute a residence.

A place of business does not alone constitute a residence, and accordingly a person may be a nonresident within the attachment laws, although he has a regular place of business within the state.[92] Conversely, a debtor is not liable to attachment in the state of his residence because he has a regular place of business in another state[93]

e. Intention as Bearing on Question of Residence

Defendant's intention alone does not fix his residence.

Although, as will be shown in §§ 33, 34, intention coupled with affirmative action is usually determinative, a person's intention as to the future does not, of itself, affect the question of his residence[94] So where one is a resident the fact that he intends to remove from the state will not make him a nonresident,[95] and conversely, where one, even though present in the state, has never become a resident, the fact that he intends to remain and become such does not make him a resident.[96]

§ 33. —— Acquisition of Residence

Intention to acquire a residence combined with actual residence, however short, is determinative of the question of residence.

Congressman

A member of Congress brought to the District of Columbia solely by his public duties must, in the absence of a plain, unequivocal showing to the contrary, be regarded as an inhabitant and resident of the state which he represents in congress, only a visitor to the District of Columbia, and therefore a nonresident of the latter within the meaning of the attachment statute—Howard v. Citizens' Bank, etc., Co., 12 App.D.C. 222.

permanently,[98] or for an indefinite period,[99] and it has been held that a person who has abandoned his native land and is living in a state with no intention of going elsewhere is a resident of that state.[1]

§ 34. —— Loss of Residence

a. In general
b. Effect of absence

a. In General

Residence is lost by leaving the state with the intention of becoming a nonresident.

A resident of a state becomes a nonresident by actually leaving the state[2] with the intention of becoming a nonresident.[3] The fact that a person moves his wife and children out of the state, together with certain exempt property, but himself remains in the state with no intention of abandoning his residence, does not constitute him a nonresident of the state.[4]

b. Effect of Absence

(1) Temporary
(2) Prolonged

(1) Temporary

Mere temporary absences do not ordinarily entail loss of residence.

Mere casual or temporary absence from the state will not make the absentee a nonresident,[5] especially where he has and retains a place of abode within the state,[6] or lacks any intention of acquiring a fixed residence elsewhere.[7]

Recurring temporary absences at periodic intervals do not make the absentee a nonresident,[8] unless his stays within the state are so short in duration as to amount only to a succession of visits.[9]

(2) Prolonged

Residence may be lost by prolonged absence from the state.

An absence from the state prolonged for an indefinite period, makes the absentee a nonresident,[10] particularly where, during his absence, he has no place of abode within the state,[11] or where he has no intention of returning within a reasonably definite period.[12] The fact that he may have a general intention to return at some future time is immaterial,[13] and such general intention becomes even less important when the absentee acquires a place of abode in another state[14] So the cause of his absence does not affect the rule if such absence prevents personal service for an indefinite length of time[15]

§ 35. Fraudulent Transfer or Disposition of Property

Fraudulent transfer or disposition of property is a distinct ground of attachment under some statutes.

Where a defendant in an attachment proceeding had been absent from the state for over a year, and was so ill that the time of his return to the state, even if he were ever able to return, was uncertain, he was a "nonresident" of the state within the meaning of the statute relating to attachment of property of nonresident.—Brann v. An attachment will lie for a fraudulent transfer or disposition of his property by a debtor where the statutes make this a ground for invoking the remedy.[16] The fact that the creditor in good faith believed that defendant fraudulently disposed of his property will not justify an attachment on this ground; the determinative question is whether he actually did so dispose of it.[17]

This ground of attachment is distinct from the grounds that the debt was fraudulently contracted or that the debtor had concealed or secreted the property[18] or intended to dispose of it fraudulently,[19] although not inconsistent therewith.[20]

§ 36. —— Intent of Debtor

Fraudulent intent on the part of the debtor being the gist of the ground, mere constructive fraud does not ordinarily warrant the attachment.

A fraudulent intent is the gist of this ground of attachment[21] and as a general rule fraud in law or constructive fraud in making the conveyance is not sufficient to constitute it a fraudulent transfer within the meaning of the attachment statutes, but must be actuated by an actual fraudulent purpose or intent.[22] In some jurisdictions, however, if a conveyance or transfer has the effect of hindering and delaying creditors, this is sufficient regardless of the debtor's intention.[23]

There is a sufficient fraudulent intent, where the debtor intends to delay his creditors,[24] to place his property so that one creditor cannot attach and get all,[25] or to force creditors to compromise by means of the conveyance;[26] but a transfer, the only purpose of which was to compel the creditor to seek the enforcement of his claim in the state of the debtor's domicile, has been held not to furnish a ground for attachment.[27]

In Missouri
(1) The cases are in conflict as to whether an actual fraudulent intent is necessary in order for an attachment to lie on the statutory ground that "defendant had fraudulently conveyed or assigned his property or effects, so as to hinder or delay his creditors The rule of the text has found support in cases holding that there must be both a fraudulent intent on the part of the debtor, and the effect of the conveyance must be to hinder or delay creditors; either alone is not sufficient, both must concur—Conran v. Fenn, 140 S.W. 82, 159 Mo.App. 664—Belcher-Brown Lumber & Mercantile Co. v. Drane, 80 S.W 307, 107 Mo.App. 56.
(2) So it has been held that where the deed itself appeared to be fair and made in good faith, the intent to delay creditors was necessary to constitute it a fraud upon them—Spencer v. Deagle, 34 Mo. 455.
(3) On the other hand, it has been said, "The term fraud, as understood in the statute concerning fraudulent conveyances, has the same meaning in the attachment law, and it is not necessary to show that the act originated in any meditated design to commit a positive fraud or to injure other persons"—Reed v. Pelletier, 28 Mo. 173, 177.
(4) Accordingly, several cases hold that it is not necessary that there be an actual fraudulent intent. When a voluntary deed is made by a debtor in embarrassed circumstances, the law does not concern itself about his private or secret motives, but if that deed hinders or delays his creditors the law presumes it was made with fraudulent intent, however pure in reality the motives of the debtor may have been, and an attachment is warranted thereby—Potter v McDowell, 31 Mo 62—Simmons Hardware Co v Fighting the Flames Co, 115 S.W 467, 135 Mo App 266—Dunham-Buckley v. Standley, 40 Mo App 138—Douglass v Cissna, 17 Mo App. 44.
(5) "While the motive which actuates the making of a fraudulent conveyance which results in hindering or delaying the grantor's creditors is wholly immaterial, yet the conveyance must be fraudulent, in law or in fact, if it constitutes a ground for attachment"—State ex rel First Nat Bank v Trimble, 287 S.W. 432, 434, 315 Mo 966, quashing certiorari First Nat. The intention of the transferee who receives the property is immaterial.[28]

§ 37. —— Property Whose Transfer May Afford Ground for Attachment

Property fraudulently transferred within the statute may include choses in action, judgments or property outside the state.

A chose in action,[29] a judgment,[30] or property situated outside of the state[31] may be fraudulently transferred so as to afford a ground for attachment. But a fraudulent transfer of land has been held not a ground for attachment.[32]

§ 38. —— Amount of Property Transferred or Disposed of

A debtor's disposition of a part of his property warrants the attachment.

It is not necessary that the debtor should dispose of all of his property,[33] but if he fraudulently disposes of, conveys, or secretes only a part of his property, an attachment may be had.[34] It is not necessary in order to sustain an attachment, for plaintiff to show that defendant's property remaining after such disposition is insufficient to pay his debts.[35]

§ 39. —— Time of Transfer or Disposition

The disposition relied upon must ordinarily have been made after plaintiff's claim existed, although if made before, it may under some circumstances form the basis of the remedy.

In order to warrant an attachment the transfer or disposition of property must, ordinarily, have been made after plaintiff's claim was in existence,[36] although a previous transfer might be sufficient where the debtor intended at the time to contract the particular debt for which attachment is sought and defraud the creditor.[37]

§ 40. —— Necessity for Injury to Attaching Creditor

To warrant an attachment, the transfer must have injured the attaching creditor.

In order to support an attachment on the ground under consideration, it must be made to appear that the attaching creditor is injured by the transfer or disposition relied on.[38]

§ 41. —— Insolvency of Debtor

Solvency of the debtor or his surety does not defeat the remedy if a material portion of his property has passed.

It is not essential to an attachment on the ground that the debtor has fraudulently transferred or disposed of property that the debtor should be insolvent,[39] although, where he is not so, it must be shown that a material portion of his property has passed.[40] The solvency of a surety of the debtor does not affect the right to attachment on this ground.[41]

§ 42. —— What Constitutes Transfer in General

A transfer within the attachment statute ordinarily imports a voluntary alienation of his own title by defendant.

To constitute a transfer within the meaning of the attachment acts there must be a voluntary[42] alienation of title[43] by defendant[44] of his own property.[45]

Attempt to reconvey
That defendants more than a year prior to attachment attempted to reconvey land to the creditor in satisfaction of the note sued on given for such land does not justify attachment, the creditor having refused to accept such reconveyance.—Stricker v. Trullinger, 216 N.W. 231, 172 Minn. 547.

fraudulent transfers of property,[46] although it has also been regarded as including only alienations of property which may be effected by mere delivery without a written instrument.[47]

"Assignment." Where the statute makes the ground that defendant has fraudulently "conveyed or assigned" his property distinct from the ground that he has fraudulently "concealed, removed, or disposed of" his property, the word "assigned" refers to an assignment in its limited sense, that is an assignment by writing, and not to a verbal sale.[48]

§ 43. —— Sale

A sale whether in ordinary course of trade or in bulk will not warrant an attachment unless made with fraudulent intent which, however, may be inferred from secrecy, inadequacy of consideration, or fraudulent disposition of proceeds.

To support an attachment on the ground that defendant has fraudulently transferred or disposed of his property, it is not enough that plaintiff shows that defendant had sold or conveyed his property.[49] Sales by a debtor in the ordinary course of trade are usually not regarded as fraudulent,[50] even though the goods are sold cheaply[51] or the debtor is insolvent,[52] and the application of the proceeds to pay debts rebuts any inference of fraud.[53] But a sale made with a fraudulent intent as to creditors will justify an attachment, even though made in the usual course of business.[54]

Secret sales will usually justify an inference of fraudulent intent,[55] as will also a marked inadequacy of consideration,[56] or a fraudulent disposition of the proceeds.[57]

A failure to make delivery sufficient to pass title to the purchaser as against the creditors of the seller has been held not to make the sale fraudulent so as to warrant an attachment.[58]

Under Bulk Sales Law. Since a creditor has no right to control an individual in the sale of his merchandise in the absence of fraud, an attachment will not lie during the statutory period when the sale is in suspense to prevent a sale fully complying with the Bulk Sales Act.[59] Moreover, noncompliance with the requirements of the act, standing alone, has been held no such badge of fraud as to justify an attachment,[60] but there is authority to the contrary;[61] and the fact that certain debts were omitted from the list of creditors furnished by defendant to the purchaser attempting to comply with the act is not ground for an attachment.[62]

§ 44. —— Mortgage or Pledge

Execution of a mortgage by a debtor will warrant an attachment only when done with fraudulent intent.

The fact that a debtor has executed a mortgage upon the property is not of itself ground for an attachment,[63] even though there be a great disproportion of the value of the property mortgaged and the amount secured thereby,[64] and, as shown infra § 47, even though done to prefer creditors. But a mortgage is such a transfer as will warrant attachment, when it was made for the purpose of defrauding creditors[65] or of hindering or delaying them, even though the mortgagor did not intend eventually to defeat them, and even though the debt secured by the mortgage was valid;[66] and such an intention is apparent, where the amount of the mortgage greatly exceeds the debt secured thereby,[67] or, as it has been held, where the debtor and mortgagor is permitted to retain possession of and sell the mortgaged property,[68] although there is contrary authority.[69] A transfer of property to secure a debt, where the value of the property is less than the debt, cannot however, be considered a transfer with intent to defraud within the spirit of the attachment statute.[70]

§ 45. —— Judgments and Executions

A fraudulent confession of judgment warrants attachment.

A confession of judgment is usually regarded as a voluntary transfer within the attachment statutes[71] and when fraudulently made will warrant the issuance of a writ,[72] although, as will be shown infra § 47, thus preferring a creditor is not, in the absence of fraud, a ground for attachment.

§ 46. —— Assignment for Benefit of Creditors

An assignment for the benefit of creditors does not justify an attachment unless fraudulently made

The fact that a debtor has made a general assignment for the benefit of creditors does not warrant an attachment on the ground that he has fraudulently transferred or disposed of his property,[73] even though such assignment is void,[74] nor is the remedy warranted by the fact that the debtor was disposing of his property to devote it to the payment of his creditors, thereby accomplishing the same result.[75]

An assignment for the benefit of creditors is a sufficient transfer to warrant an attachment, however, where it is tainted with a fraudulent intent,[76] as where it includes fictitious claims,[77] reserves benefits to the assignor,[78] or allows him to retain possession of the assigned property.[79]

§ 47. —— Preference to Creditors

An attachment is not warranted by the mere fact that defendant has preferred some creditors over others.

It is not, ordinarily considered, a fraudulent transfer justifying attachment for a debtor to prefer one creditor over others,[80] whether this is done by way of absolute conveyance of property in

"Unfair preference"

(1) In construing a Mississippi statute which enumerated, as one of the grounds of attachment, a disposition of his property by the debtor "with intent to defraud his creditors, or give an unfair preference to some of them," it was decided that no preference could be held to be unfair which, tested by the rules of law, is legal; and that, as to be illegal it must be fraudulent, and as all fraudulent dispositions of his property by a debtor are prohibited in other words, the clause relating to unfair preference is mere surplusage, this construction being confirmed by the fact that the words in question were omitted from the code of 1830 by the legislature of Mississippi.—Fitzpatrick v. Flannagan, (Miss.) 1 S.Ct. 389, 106 U.S. 648, 27 L.Ed. 211.

(2) Under the Louisiana statute providing that a creditor may attach his debtor's property where the latter has "mortgaged, assigned or disposed of, or is about to mortgage, assign or dispose of his property, rights or credits, or some part thereof with intent to . . . give an unfair preference to some of [his creditors]" In order to sustain an attachment on this ground, the creditor must show an intent on the part of his debtor to "give an unfair preference"—State Bank of New Iberia v. Martin, 28 So. 130, 52 La.Ann. 1628—Winter v. Davis, 19 So. 263, 48 La.Ann. 260.

(3) The attachment must be supported by proof of some act or declaration of purpose from which a fraudulent intent of the debtor may be reasonably gathered.—State Bank of New Iberia v. Martin, supra.

(4) Attachment therefore on this ground cannot be sustained where the proof merely shows intent to liquidation of the debt,[81] by confessing a judgment in the creditor's favor,[82] by way of mortgage to secure payment,[83] or by way of actual payment of the debt.[84]

The transfer is fraudulent, however, if the debtor intends to secure benefits to himself thereby,[85] or intends to hinder and delay his other creditors,[86] or avoid the payment of his debts due other creditors[87]

§ 48. —— Transfer to Relatives

A transfer to relatives is not of itself ground for attachment although in conjunction with other circumstances it may give rise to a presumption of fraud.

The circumstance that relationship exists between the parties to a conveyance alleged to be fraudulent does not of itself show fraud,[88] but where the good faith of a transfer is in question the relationship of the parties is a fact for the consideration of the jury,[89] and a presumption of fraud may arise from the fact that the sale was a secret one,[90] or was made to pay an alleged debt which did not appear on the debtor's account books,[91] or from the debtor's financial worthlessness at the time.[92]

§ 49. —— Transactions in Relation to Exempt Property

Attachments cannot be grounded upon transactions relating to exempt property.

A debtor may dispose of exempt property without subjecting himself to attachment therefor, as his creditors have no rights to or interest in such property unless secured by contract[93] It has also been held not a fraudulent transfer for an insolvent debtor to use money to pay off a mortgage on his homestead,[94] or to exchange for stock which will be exempt.[95]

§ 50. —— Intended Transfer or Disposition

a. In general
b. What constitutes being "about" to dispose of property
c. Fraudulent intent

a. In General

Under some statutes it is a ground for attachment that the debtor is about to dispose of his property in fraud of creditors.

That a debtor is about to dispose of his property for the purpose of defrauding his creditors is a ground for attachment to issue against his property where the statutes make it so;[96] and, where an attachment is sought on this ground, it is not necessary that the debtor should be a resident within the state[97]

It is the actual facts as to defendant's fraudulent intention which govern in determining whether an attachment should issue on this ground; and the make preference without showing that such preference was "unfair."—State Bank of New Iberia v Martin, supra—Seelingson v. Rigmaiden, 37 La.Ann. 722

(5) A fortiori, where the proof shows no intent to make any preference either fair or unfair—Lehman v. McFarland, 35 La.Ann. 624

(6) Where the proof does show an intent to make an "unfair preference," an attachment can be sustained on this ground—Bowling v. Colvin, 22 So. 374, 49 La.Ann. 1340.

(7) An "unfair preference" has been held to exist where it was shown that the creditor knew or had reason to know, that the debtor was insolvent, and that the transaction actually gave the creditor some advantage over other creditors—Patterson Bank v. Urban Co., 38 So. 561, 114 La. 788.

(8) So there is an "unfair preference" where the proof showed that the debtor making the preference had been deceiving his creditors and attempting to evade payment of his debts.—Stevens v. Helpman, 29 La. Ann. 635.

Writing checks

"The fact that a resident debtor has written, or is about to write, checks to pay a portion of his indebtedness, and at the same time refuses to pay other creditors, does not constitute . . . assigning or disposing of his property with intent to defraud his creditors"—Stephens Howard Co v. remedy is justified neither by mere suspicions and conclusions as to such intentions on the part of plaintiff[98] nor by a bona fide belief on his part.[99]

b. What Constitutes Being "About" to Dispose of Property

A debtor who has decided to dispose of his property and intends to do so soon is "about" to dispose of it.

A debtor who has formed a design to dispose of his property and intends soon to carry it out is "about" to dispose of his property within the meaning of the attachment statutes;[1] and it is not necessary that there should be an actual transfer,[2] or any overt act on the part of the debtor,[3] nor is the particular mode of disposition contemplated by the debtor material.[4]

c. Fraudulent Intent

To justify an attachment on the ground of contemplated fraudulent disposition, the debtor at the time of the issuance thereof must be possessed of the intent which moves a debtor making an actual fraudulent transfer.

Where the attachment is based on a contemplated fraudulent disposal of his property by a debtor, the fraudulent intent is the gist of the matter;[5] and to justify the remedy such intent must exist at the time the attachment issues,[6] and must be in all respects similar to the intent which actuates a debtor making an actual fraudulent transfer of his property.[7]

§ 51. Removal or Concealment of Property

Actual or contemplated removal or concealment of property by a debtor is usually a ground of attachment when made with fraudulent intent or when injury to the creditors results.

Although mere removal of property of itself will not warrant the issuance of a writ of attachment[8] unless the statute expressly makes this a ground,[9] applying the attachment acts it is usually held that where creditors are threatened with loss thereby or where the acts were done with fraudulent intent, a creditor is entitled to an attachment on the ground that the debtor has actually removed or contemplates removal of his property from the jurisdiction of the court,[10] or has concealed his property and effects.[11] So where plaintiff has just grounds to fear that defendant will move his property out of the state without paying him, he may resort to the writ.[12] In some jurisdictions, however, there must be both a concealment and an unjust refusal to apply to the payment of debts.[13]

This ground is distinct from the ground that the debt was fraudulently contracted and both need not exist to enable plaintiff to issue an attachment.[14]

Exempt property may be removed out of the state by a debtor without subjecting himself to attachment, since such property is beyond the reach of creditors who have not secured it by contract,[15] and where the nature of the property is such that it must be taken from the state in order to be used or disposed of, the statutes in question have been held not applicable.[16]

§ 52. —— Intent of Debtor

In some jurisdictions to warrant attachment there must be a fraudulent intent; in others, intent is immaterial.

In some jurisdictions it is held that the gist of this ground is the fraudulent intent of the debtor[17] and that the removal must be made with a fraudulent intent in order to warrant attachment.[18] In other jurisdictions, however, the purpose of the removal and the bona fides of the transaction are immaterial,[19] and in still others the intent is not material if, by the removal, the creditor is threatened with the loss of his debt[20]

§ 53. —— What Constitutes Removal

a. In general
b. Amount of property removed
c. Period of removal

a. In General

Removal to justify an attachment ordinarily contemplates actual physical removal, although shipments made in the usual course of trade or to a bona fide creditor do not ordinarily give rise to the remedy.

An attachment sought on the ground of actual removal of property is justified where there is an actual physical removal thereof by the debtor.[21] It is not sufficient that the debtor has sold property and appropriated the proceeds[22] or falsely denied the receipt of certain funds[23]

Ordinary sales in the usual course of business do not necessarily furnish grounds for attachment, although shipments are made to points outside of the state,[24] but, on the other hand, shipments in the regular course of trade may be made under such circumstances as to warrant attachment.[25]

A shipment to a bona fide creditor outside of the state of goods in payment of the debt is not a fraudulent removal warranting attachment.[26]

b. Amount of Property Removed

To warrant an attachment in some jurisdictions the defendant must have removed a material part of his property, but elsewhere the amount removed does not affect the plaintiff's right to the remedy.

While it has been held not a defense to an attachment on the ground of fraudulent removal or

Proceedings before debt due

In attachment proceedings before debt due, removal of property, specified as a ground for attachment, must be to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors.—McCartney v. McCartney, (Neb.) 260 N.W 184—Stockgrowers' State Bank of Worland v. Millard, 186 P. 121, 26 Wyo. 394.

In Missouri

(1) Where the attachment is based on the tenth ground of the statute, viz. that "defendant is about fraudulently to conceal, remove or dispose of his property or effects, so as to hinder or delay his creditors," the actual intent of the debtor is not controlling; it is enough if his acts are constructively fraudulent, or fraudulent in law, and tend to hinder or delay existing creditors in the enforcement of their demands.—Mathewson v. Larson-Myers Co., (App.) 217 S.W. 609—Matthews v. Loth, 45 Mo.App. 455.

(2) Where the attachment is based on the eighth ground of the statute, namely, that "defendant has fraudulently concealed, removed or disposed of his property or effects, so as to hinder or delay his creditors," the same rule applies.—Matthews v. Loth, supra.

(3) Accordingly the concealment of the debtor's effects from his creditors, although for the purpose of subsequently using them toward the discharge of valid claims against himself, is ground for an attachment based on the eighth ground.—Dodson-Hills Mfg. Co. v. Payton, 65 Mo App. 311.

(4) Nor is it a defense that money was concealed for the purpose of using it to defend against prospective attachments in order that creditors who did not attach might not suffer a disadvantage at the hands of those who saw fit to attach.—Matthews v. Loth, supra.

(5) But when the action is founded on the fifth ground, to wit, that "defendant is about to remove his property or effects out of this state with the intent to defraud, hinder or delay his creditors," an actual purpose to defraud, hinder, or delay must appear.—Simmons Hardware Co. v Fighting the Flames Co., 115 S.W. 467, 135 Mo.App. 266.

Fraudulent intent not shown

A contemplated removal of a truck from the county by defendant, whose place of business was in another county, which followed the bringing of an action of replevin, in which bond to this plaintiff with approved surety in double the value of the truck was filed, is not removal with intent to defraud creditors, so as to justify issuance of fraudulent debtor's attachment.—Locey v. Breach of contract

Where defendant had promised to assign to plaintiff the bill of lading on its lumber manufactured for it by plaintiff, and was, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, shipping the lumber out of the state without having assigned the bill of lading, a writ of attachment on the lumber was properly issued in plaintiff's action for compensation for manufacture of the lumber.—Morganton Mfg. & Trading Co v Foy-Seawell Lumber Co., 99 S E 104, 177 N C. 404.

concealment that defendant has other property out of which he might make his debt,[27] that being rather a matter going to the issue of good faith with reference to the alleged acts on which the attachment is grounded,[28] in some jurisdictions it is held that in order to warrant an attachment defendant must have removed such a material part of his property as to endanger the collection of plaintiff's claim,[29] but according to some authorities this condition exists and an attachment is warranted, if defendant has not enough property left within the state to pay all his creditors.[30]

c. Period of Removal

The removal contemplated is a permanent, and not a temporary, one.

The removal which the statutes contemplate as a ground for attachment is a permanent taking away and not a mere temporary removal or use of the property by the owner outside of the state.[31]

§ 54. —— What Constitutes Concealment

Concealment within the act is a physical hiding or secreting defeating seizure by the creditors.

To constitute concealment within the meaning of attachment statutes, it is necessary that there should be a physical hiding or secreting of property so that it cannot be seized to satisfy creditors' claims.[32] Thus a solvent merchant may use the proceeds of the sale of his goods for his private purposes, even though he places them beyond the reach of his creditors, without being guilty of fraudulent concealment of his property;[33] but the fact that a stock of goods has been converted into money, and the stock greatly reduced, has been held to be a fraudulent concealment.[34] When the plaintiff is entitled to a part of the proceeds of a sale, and the defendant, having received it all, refuses to pay plaintiff his share, this is a concealment which will support an attachment.[35] Paying some creditors and at the same time refusing to pay others does not constitute secreting with fraudulent intent.[36]

An unsuccessful attempt to conceal will sustain an attachment.[37]

Concealment and refusal to pay. Where both concealment and refusal to apply in payment are required, there must be an affirmative act of concealing as well as a negative omission to pay.[38]

§ 55. —— Intended Removal

A debtor's act in preparing to carry out his purpose of removing his property entitles a creditor who would probably be injured thereby to an attachment.

As has been shown supra § 51, the fact that defendant contemplates removal of his property is ordinarily a ground for attachment. Where the debtor entertains the purpose of removing his property and is making preparations to carry it out, there is such intended or contemplated removal as entitles the creditor to attachment, within the rule there stated,[39] provided he shows a probable injury to him, if the removal should be effected,[40] and the mere fact that the defendant may be solvent will not defeat the attachment.[41]

§ 56. Other Grounds

Insolvency or bankruptcy is not a ground for attachment unless the statutes so provide.

In addition to the common grounds of attachment discussed supra §§ 24–55, other grounds less generally provided will be considered in this section and §§ 57–68. The mere fact that a debtor is insolvent[42] or has filed a petition in bankruptcy[43] will not justify a resort to attachment, where that is not one of the specified grounds therefor. Under some statutes, however, as will be seen infra § 65, the fact that defendant has insufficient property in the state to satisfy plaintiff's demand is a ground for attachment. Where no statutory ground therefor exists, attachment will not lie merely to enable the creditor to make his obligation a preferred claim and prevent the debtor from applying his property to the payment of other debts.[44]

§ 57. —— Acts in Official or Fiduciary Capacity

Attachment being, as stated supra § 2, purely a statutory remedy, it must follow that acts committed by defendant in an official or fiduciary capacity not otherwise falling within the statutory grounds afford no ground for the issuance of the writ unless the statute so provides. That an action based on a breach of trust will support an attachment where proper grounds exist, however, is shown supra § 11, and that persons in fiduciary capacity may under some circumstances, although not ordinarily, be liable in attachment proceedings is shown supra § 21 d.

§ 58. —— Criminal Act in Incurring Liability

The fact that the plaintiff's damages resulted from a criminal act of the defendant is ground for attachment under some statutes.

Where the attachment statutes make the fact that the debt or obligation in suit has been criminally contracted or incurred a ground for issuing an attachment, plaintiff bringing himself within the statute is entitled to the relief.[45] The term "obligation" as employed in such statutes is equivalent to "liability," and although the statute refers to obligations "fraudulently or criminally incurred," plaintiff is entitled to the remedy where the ingredient of criminality is present without that of fraud.[46] Accordingly, it has been held that attachment is properly granted in civil actions arising out of assault and battery,[47] rape,[48] or the operation of a motor vehicle in a manner prohibited by law and punishable as a misdemeanor;[49] but an action for damages for malicious prosecution will not justify an attachment under the statute.[50]

Injuries to property as well as to the person are within the statute;[51] and it has been held not necessary that the action be technically founded on the wrong relied on as ground for the attachment, but an action by the surety in a fidelity bond against the principal to recover the amount paid by plaintiff on account of defendant's embezzlement is within the provisions of an act authorizing an attachment where the damages arise "from the commission of a felony."[52]

§ 59. —— Death of Nonresident Debtor Leaving Property in State

In a proper case a creditor may attach property left by a deceased nonresident.

Under statutes making this a ground for the remedy an attachment is properly issued where any person liable for any debt or demand, residing out of the state, dies, leaving property in the state.[53] Attachment in such case is intended to afford the creditor a simple and speedy remedy for the collection of his debt where administration was not granted, too expensive, or unnecessary, but cannot be employed to provide a method by which one creditor might, by diligence, obtain priority over other creditors where suggestion of insolvency has been made by the administrator of the debtor.[54] Where the creditor invoking the statute resides out of the state and in the same state as the heirs of the deceased debtor, his rights thereunder are subject to the provision of another statute that if the debtor and creditor are both nonresidents of the state and residents of the same state the creditor cannot have an attachment unless he swear that the property was fraudulently removed from the state of the debtor's residence.[55]

§ 60. —— Demand Not Otherwise Secured

Under statutes authorizing an attachment where the plaintiff's claim is not secured or security given therefor has become valueless, the statutory facts must be shown to warrant the remedy.

In some jurisdictions the statutes provide that plaintiff may have an attachment in certain actions

when his claim is not secured, or, if originally secured, when the security has, without his fault, become valueless In order to sustain the attachment on this ground either of two facts must be established· (a) That the debt had not been secured originally, or (b) that, if secured in the beginning, the security later became valueless[56] A surrender by the creditor of any security given for the debt, however, entitles him to sue out an attachment[57]

Where security has become valueless. A security becomes worthless without fault on the part of the creditor, so as to entitle him to maintain an action under the statutes under consideration, where a vendee's lien becomes subordinate to a mortgage given to a good-faith incumbrancer,[58] where the property securing plaintiff's mortgage is sold by the mortgagor with the consent of the mortgagee,[59] or, in the case of a pledge, by the pledgee in accordance with the conditions of the pledge,[60] or where property embraced in a chattel mortgage was not mortgageable and other creditors have levied attachments on it to an extent exceeding its value.[61] Waiver of his security by act of a conditional seller in passing title to the buyer, however, does not bring him within the statute.[62] and such a provision is not applicable to a case where the security was originally worthless,[63] or has become so through lapse of time,[64] although where pretended security is valueless because the property which it purports to cover had no tangible existence at the time the security was given, the attachment will lie.[65]

§ 61. —— Failure to Pay for Goods on Delivery

Under some statutes a seller delivering goods and demanding payment under an unconditional contract to pay for them on delivery is entitled to an attachment where the buyer fails to pay for them.

It is sometimes made a ground for attachment that defendant has failed or refused to pay the price or value of any article or thing delivered to him, which he should have paid for on the delivery thereof. The right to an attachment under such a statute belongs to the seller alone;[66] and to warrant the remedy, the thing must have been delivered,[67] there must have been no credit given;[68] there must have been a contract to pay on delivery,[69] which contract must have been unconditional;[70] and payment must have been demanded.[71]

§ 62. —— Failure to Pay for Labor on Performance

The plaintiff in a proper case is entitled to an attachment although not claiming a lien where the statute authorizes the remedy on failure, on its completion, to pay for work performed when payment is required by contract at such time.

Failure to pay for work or labor performed at the time of its completion, when the contract requires payment at such time, is sometimes made a ground of attachment. This is an independent ground, and plaintiff is entitled to an attachment on proving his claim thereunder regardless of his failure to prove any facts constituting other proper grounds[72] So an attachment is warranted on this ground after demand for the amount due where by contract plaintiff is employed to work for defendant, by day or month, and nothing is said as to the time of payment for services rendered;[73] and no lien claim is required to be set out to enable plaintiff to attach defendant's property under such statutes.[74]

What constitutes cash transaction

Where plaintiff delivered a car to defendant after banking hours on Saturday, accepted her check and gave a receipt, after which defendant suggested that her bank account was short of the amount necessary to cover the check, and in fact her account at that time did not contain sufficient funds for the purpose, if the deal was closed prior to her assertion that she would deposit sufficient funds on Monday to take care of the matter, it was a cash transaction, and the statutory ground of attachment, that defendant failed and refused to pay the price which should have been paid on delivery is supported —Allen v Gilman, 218 P 1044, 74 Colo 116

§ 63. —— Fraud in Incurring Liability

a. In general
b. What constitutes fraud
c. Fraudulent written statement

a. In General

Fraud in incurring liability is a ground for attachment in some jurisdictions available in an action on the fraudulently incurred liability between the original parties to the transaction.

Statutes in some jurisdictions make fraud on the part of a debtor in contracting a debt a ground for attachment in an action on the obligation thus created, and where plaintiff establishes such fraud, he is entitled to an attachment thereunder.[76]

It has been held that, where an attachment on this ground is sought, only the fraudulently incurred liability can be included in the attachment suit,[77] but there is also authority for the view that attachment is an available remedy, where only a part of the indebtedness sued on was fraudulently contracted,[78] although in such case the attachment could be for only such part as was affected by the fraud.[79] Where plaintiff deliberately undertakes to issue an attachment for his entire claim, part of which he knows was lawfully contracted, the court will not separate the lawful part from the fraudulent, but the entire attachment will fail.[80]

Intent. In order to support an attachment, there must have been an intent to defraud on the part of the debtor.[81]

The right of an assignee of a chose in action to procure a writ of attachment on the ground that the debt or obligation was fraudulently incurred exists only against his immediate assignor,[82] for, as shown supra § 20 a, the assignee of a debt fraudulently contracted is not ordinarily entitled to an attachment against the original obligor.

b. What Constitutes Fraud

(1) In general
(2) False representations

(1) In General

An intent not to pay a debt or to keep collateral agreements entertained at the time of contracting the debt or a conspiracy to borrow money on worthless security constitutes fraud, but a subsequent breach of the agreement not intended at the inception of the contract does not.

A debt is fraudulently contracted if at the time of contracting it, the debtor entertained an intention not to pay,[83] or an intention not to keep a collateral agreement regarding the disposition of property purchased on credit;[84] and a conspiracy to borrow money on worthless security upon which the lender relied in making the loan is fraud within the meaning of the statute.[85] The fraudulent intent must, however, have existed at the time of the inception of the debt or making of the contract.[86]

In an action on a claim for damages sustained by plaintiff by reason of the fraudulent sale by defendant to plaintiff of a quantity of steel scrap, in billing and collecting from plaintiff for ninety three thousand and six hundred pounds and fraudulently shipping only thirty six thousand and sixty pounds of said scrap, an attachment is justified under the statute—Benjamin Emmerman v. Change of relationship
To authorize attachment against a broker by a customer, where the broker, to whom the customer pledged stock for the unpaid part of the price, with agreement by the broker to return securities of like kind and amount, on payment or tender of the amount secured, repledged the stock for a greater amount than the customer owed him, and deprived himself of the power to perform his contract for the return thereof, it is not necessary that there should have been fraud, or intention to defraud, on the part of the broker, at the time of such contract; but such acts of

The fraud necessary to authorize an attachment is not shown by a breach of a bona fide promise to give security[87] or to deposit the proceeds of subsequent sales with the creditor in accordance with an agreement extending credit,[88] nor is it shown by a breach of warranty,[89] a mere failure to pay the debt at maturity,[90] a breach of an agreement to pay a debt out of a certain fund[91] or to apply money to the satisfaction of a certain debt,[92] or mere insolvency at the time the debt was created unaccompanied by some artifice practiced to consummate the transaction.[93]

The nature of the cause of action negatives the existence of such fraud as will warrant attachment where plaintiff seeks a recovery for malicious prosecution,[94] negligence or misconduct of a professional man,[95] or a conversion of property;[96] and an action by the surety in a fidelity bond against the principal to recover the amount paid by plaintiff on account of an embezzlement by defendant from the obligee is based upon an implied contract to repay such amount, and the debt is not one "fraudulently contracted," within the meaning of an attachment statute.[97]

(2) False Representations

(a) In general

(b) As to financial condition

(a) In General

Obtaining property or credit by false representations as to material facts made by the defendant to the plaintiff with intent to deceive constitutes fraud warranting attachment.

Securing property or credit by false representations regarding existing ascertainable facts constitutes such fraud as will warrant attachment.[98] Mere expressions of opinion are not sufficient, however, to warrant the remedy on this ground,[99] particularly when made with a belief in their truth,[1] and neither are statements as to the future success of a business.[2] In order to warrant the remedy the false representations must be made to plaintiff[3] by defendant[4] with an intention to deceive,[5] and they must also be material,[6] and must be relied on by plaintiff in giving credit.[7]

An intention not to pay, existing at the time when the debt was contracted, is not necessary to warrant an attachment where the credit was secured by false representations.[8]

(b) As to Financial Condition

False representations by a debtor as to his financial condition generally warrant an attachment on the ground of fraud, but mere failure to disclose such condition does not.

Fraud is not shown by the mere failure of defendant to disclose that he is doing business on borrowed capital,[9] or by his failure to disclose insolvency which is not hopelessly irremediable at the time the debt was created;[10] but generally an attachment is warranted by false representations by the debtor as to his financial condition,[11] such as a false allegation of solvency[12] or a false state-repledging, constituting a conversion of the stock, and thereby making the broker a debtor of the customer, were also a fraud, simultaneous with the creation of the debt, sufficient for attachment.—Turner & Thomas v William Schwarz & Sons, 117 A 904, 140 Md. 465, 24 A.L.R. 444

ment regarding the ownership[13] or value[14] of property. Where the attachment is based on this ground it must appear that the obligation sued on was created in reliance on the false statement.[15]

c. Fraudulent Written Statement

Written, signed statements constituting fraud required by some acts to warrant attachment must contain at least the substance of the fraudulent statement relied upon and must bear the defendant's signature.

Where the statute authorizes an attachment provided the statements of the debtor, his agent or attorney, which constitute the fraud, shall have been reduced to writing and his signature attached thereto by himself, agent, or attorney, the written statement need not contain everything that is said nor all the devices that may be used to complete the fraud and need not be reduced to writing for the purpose of furnishing evidence of the fraud. It is enough if the writing contain the substance in general of the statements which constituted the fraud; and if the fraud is consummated and the writing is given at the time, after the verbal statements which induced the fraud are made, it will be sufficient.[16]

A written statement made by defendant's agents, to which defendant's signature is not attached, is not, however, such a statement as the statute contemplates,[17] and neither is the act of defendant in forging the name of the payee on the back of a check, or a subsequent letter written over the signature of his attorney, admitting the previous wrongdoing and expressing a desire to make amends.[18]

§ 64. —— Impairment of Security

Mistaken belief of the plaintiff as to property covered by security, and act of the defendant placing pledged property in escrow, do not warrant attachment on the ground that the security was impaired.

It is sometimes made a ground of attachment that the security of plaintiff has been impaired or rendered nugatory by the act of defendant. The mere fact that plaintiff believed that certain property belonged to defendant and was included in a bill of sale securing plaintiff's debt, when in fact it belonged to another and was not included therein, does not warrant an attachment on this ground,[19] and neither does the act of defendant in placing in escrow certain stock certificates which had been pledged to plaintiff.[20]

§ 65. —— Insufficient Property in State to Satisfy Demand

Under statutes so providing, the plaintiff is entitled to an attachment where it appears that the defendant's property in the state, subject to execution, is insufficient to pay the plaintiff's demand, and the collection thereof will be endangered by delay in obtaining judgment.

As has been shown in § 56, insolvency or bankruptcy is not a ground for attachment unless the statutes so provide. Under some statutes an attachment is authorized in an action for the recovery of money due upon a contract, judgment, or award, if defendant has no property in the state subject to execution or not enough to satisfy plaintiff's demand, and the collection of the demand will be endangered by delay in obtaining judgment or a return of no property found. In order to sustain an attachment on this ground both conditions of the statute, namely, the insufficiency of the property and the danger of delay, must be made to appear,[21] and when they are satisfactorily shown the attachment should be granted.[22] One of these conditions is not necessarily the concomitant of the other, although it may be so.[23]

Ability to meet check

Where the buyer of an automobile gave a check for more than the amount on deposit, which was accepted on her statement that she had a certain contest fund sufficient to meet the check which would be deposited on the next banking day, when in fact the contest fund was insufficient for that purpose, attachment was warranted on the ground that the automobile was procured by false representations—Allen v. Gilman, 218 P. 1044, 74 Colo. 116.

20. First Nat. Bank of Goldfield v. Murphy, 125 P. 365, 24 Nev. 461.

Reason for rule

"If the placing of the stock certificate in escrow rendered the security nugatory, the plaintiff was as much the cause thereof as the defendant, for the plaintiff, holding the certificate of stock as a pledge, had to consent to any modification of the conditions of its security."—First Nat Bank of Goldfield v. Solvency or insolvency of debtors when attachment was issued was immaterial in determining whether attachment would issue on ground that debtors had insufficient property subject to execution to satisfy creditor's demand and that collection of demand would be endangered by delay in obtaining judgment of return of no property found—Cannon Ball Cab & Bus Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co., 96 S.W.(2d) 760, 265 Ky. 256.

23. Walker v. Grayson County State Bank, 35 S.W (2d) 350, 237 Ky. 449.

The statute does not warrant the adding of all the debts together and authorize an attachment if the defendant's property is not sufficient to pay all the debts. The rule is that in each case the attachment cannot stand if the defendant's property which is subject to execution is sufficient to pay that debt.[24] So it is not sufficient to authorize an attachment under this statute that the debtor is insolvent,[25] or has not enough property in the state to satisfy the demand against him;[26] but plaintiff must show that the collection of his demand will be endangered unless the attachment issues.[27]

This statute does not authorize attachment for immaterial demands[28] or demands sounding in tort.[29]

Intent. No intent on the part of the debtor to defraud his creditors is necessary when an attachment is sought on this ground.[30]

Joint liability. In an action on a joint cause of action against two or more defendants, an attachment cannot be sustained against one of them on the sole ground that he has not sufficient property subject to execution to pay the debt. To warrant an attachment, it must appear that none of the obligors within the jurisdiction have enough property for this purpose.[31]

§ 66. —— Overdue Instrument for Direct Payment of Money, or Book Account

That action is brought on an overdue instrument for direct payment of money or on a book account is ground for attachment when specifically made so.

The fact that the action is brought upon an overdue promissory note, bill of exchange, other written instrument for the direct payment of money, or upon book account, will support an attachment where this is made a specific ground therefor.[32] A certified check payment of which has been refused is a written instrument contemplated by the statute,[33] and so is a written agreement to pay a mortgage given as security for a promissory note,[34] but an appeal bond is not.[35]

§ 67. —— Refusal to Pay or Secure Debt

Refusal to pay or secure a debt is not ground for attachment unless statutes so provide.

In the absence of statutes making it so, it is not a ground for attachment simply that defendant owes a debt and obstinately, for whatever reason, fails to pay it promptly,[36] or fails to perform a verbal promise to secure plaintiff who was liable as a surety thereon.[37] Statutes sometimes make it a ground for attachment, however, that one indebted on contract will not, on demand, either pay or secure the debt, and where plaintiff establishes a case within such statute, the remedy will lie;[38] but no attachment will be allowed thereunder if the debtor is willing to give reasonable security for the debt, even though the creditor cannot convert such security into cash as quickly as he might desire.[39]

Property considered

The value of motor vehicle permits owned by a cab and bus company would not be considered in determining whether attachment would issue against the cab and bus company on the ground that the company had insufficient property subject to execution to satisfy plaintiff's demand and that collection of the demand would be endangered by delay in obtaining judgment of return of no property found since such permits were not subject to execution.—Cannon Ball Cab & Bus Co. v. § 68. —— Return of "Not Found" on Ordinary Process

A "judicial" attachment taking the place of personal service may issue in some jurisdictions where ordinary process has been issued and returned "not found."

Under that class of attachment statutes whose principal object is to compel the appearance of a debtor who cannot be reached by ordinary process, where ordinary process has been issued and returned by the officer "not found," a so-called "judicial" attachment may issue.[40] In such case the attachment is sued out to take the place of personal service,[41] and it has been held that a judicial attachment lies only against residents [42]

§ 69. Evidence as to Grounds

a. Presumptions and burden of proof
b. Admissibility
c Weight and sufficiency

a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof

The burden of proof as to grounds of attachment is on the plaintiff, but shifts to the defendant when the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case.

The burden is on plaintiff to prove the grounds of his attachment where the existence of the grounds is properly denied by defendant.[43] Thus when that is the ground relied on plaintiff has the burden of proving that defendant had transferred or disposed of his property to hinder or delay creditors, or was about to do so,[44] defendant's fraud in contracting the debt or incurring the obligation,[45] nonresidence of defendant,[46] the removal of property from the jurisdiction,[47] or inability to serve the summons in the manner provided by law,[48] and where the attachment is based on defendant's failure to pay for work or labor performed at the time of its completion, the burden is on plaintiff to show, as against defendant's traverse, that the contract requires payment at such time.[49] Where defendant has not controverted allegations as to grounds, however, they stand admitted, and it is not necessary for plaintiff to prove them [50]

Fraudulent intent. There is no presumption of fraud,[51] and accordingly the burden is on plaintiff

Allegations controverted in part
Where the grounds of the attachment are that defendant has not property in the state subject to execution or a sufficiency to satisfy the demand of appellee, and that the collection of the demand will be endangered by delay in obtaining judgment or a return of no property found, and defendant did not controvert the allegation that he had not property subject to execution sufficient to satisfy the debt, but did controvert the statement that the collection would be endangered by delay, the burden of proving this issue was held to be on defendant—Moore v. Kentucky Electrical Co, 208 S W 15, 182 Ky. 825

51. Anderson v. Malley, 181 N Y S. 739, 191 App Div 573—6 C J p 58 note 49 [a], p 64 note 28 [c].

to prove that defendant acted with fraudulent intent where the attachment is sought on the ground that defendant has fraudulently transferred or disposed of his property or is about to do so,[52] or that he has removed or is about to remove his property out of the jurisdiction of the court.[53]

Where plaintiff fails to sustain his burden, the attachment must be discharged,[54] even though there is no defense to the action on the merits.[55]

Shifting of burden. In accordance with the general rules as to the shifting of the burden of proof or the burden of going forward with the evidence, where plaintiff has established a prima facie case, it devolves on defendant to meet the case made; and thus, where the attachment was based on removal of property from the state defendant should show, in response to plaintiff's evidence, that he has ample visible property to answer the demands of his creditors.[56] So where defendant is shown to be insolvent, a presumption arises that the collection of plaintiff's demand will be endangered by delay,[57] and the burden of overcoming this presumption rests on defendant.[58] Where it was conceded that defendant was a nonresident before he came into the state, the burden rested on him to prove his claim that he had become a resident prior to the issuance of the attachment based on his alleged nonresidence.[59]

b. Admissibility

(1) In general
(2) Absconding, absence, or concealment
(3) Nonresidence
(4) Fraudulent transfer or disposition of property
(5) Removal or concealment of property
(6) Fraud in incurring liability
(7) Insufficient property in state to satisfy demand

(1) In General

Any proper evidence as to grounds is competent.

When the validity of an attachment or plaintiff's right thereto is in issue, plaintiff may introduce any proper evidence tending to show that the grounds of attachment on which he relied existed at the time when the writ was sued out.[60] As the validity of an attachment must be determined by the facts existing at the date when it issues, proof of matters transpiring since the attachment was issued, however, cannot be considered[61] except, as will be shown in subdivision (4) of this subsection, as it may bear upon defendant's fraudulent intent.

Where defendant in attachment reconvenes in the main action for damages for wrongful attachment, the affidavit for attachment is not evidence of the alleged causes on which the attachment was sued out.[62]

(2) Absconding, Absence, or Concealment

Evidence of acts or declarations of the defendant ante litem motam and of the surrounding facts is admissible to show whether the issuance of an attachment on the ground of absconding or concealment was warranted.

On the issue as to whether defendant was ab-

Financial condition

(1) Where an intent to defraud creditors is charged, testimony as to the financial condition of defendant, although not known to plaintiff is admissible as bearing on the charge.—Ruthven v. Beckwith, 45 N.W. 1073, 51 N.W. 153, 84 Iowa 715.

(2) So evidence that defendant had taken advantage of the bankruptcy law about the time that the business transactions involved in the suit began was admissible on the issue of intent.—Ricker v. Davis, 139 N.W. 1110, 160 Iowa 37.

Course of business

Where defendant was engaged in the business of baling and shipping hay, evidence as to delays in getting cars for the shipment of defendant's merchandise is admissible as showing the general course of business and as bearing on the intent to defraud, but testimony as to what defendant was doing in his business is competent only so far as it expresses his intentions as known to plaintiff in attachment.—Ruthven v. Beckwith, 45 N.W. 1073, 51 N.W. 153, 84 Iowa 715.

sconding at the time of the attachment, evidence as to his purpose in leaving his place of residence is competent, and so is the publicity or secrecy of his living at a different place after his departure.[63] Admissions and declarations of defendant tending to show that he was about to remove at the time the attachment was sued out are admissible in behalf of plaintiff[64] if made before the suing out of the writ,[65] and plaintiff is also entitled to prove efforts of defendant to sell his property.[66] Evidence that other creditors sued out attachments about the time plaintiff did is not admissible, however,[67] and neither is evidence that several years after his alleged removal defendant was living outside the jurisdiction.[68]

As bearing on intent to remove and tending to disprove existence of the ground of attachment, the declarations of defendant made shortly before leaving the place of his residence, that his absence would be only temporary, are admissible,[69] and it is competent for him to prove that in connection with his going he had stated the purpose thereof and sought to borrow money to pay his expenses going and returning, and that he did return.[70] Moreover, where it is admitted that defendant left the state in the summer in which the attachment was sued out, he may show that it was his habit to leave the state on a visit every summer.[71] He cannot, however, introduce opinion evidence of another as to his intentions; nor is it competent for him to testify as to an uncommunicated intention to remain within the state.[72] Evidence of his declarations that he had no intention of removing from the jurisdiction is admissible where it appears that they were made before he knew the attachment had been issued,[73] but declarations of defendant, made after he knew that the attachment had been issued, that he had no intention of removing, are not admissible.[74]

Evidence of the character or reputation of defendant is incompetent,[75] and he cannot show that it was generally reputed in the neighborhood in which he lived that he was merely leaving the state on a temporary visit.[76]

(3) Nonresidence

Evidence tending to show the defendant's nonresidence or residence is admissible to sustain or defeat an attachment based on nonresidence.

Where the attachment was issued on the ground of nonresidence, defendant may show an intention to reside in the jurisdiction,[77] and after defendant introduces evidence that he became a resident at a certain time, plaintiff in rebuttal can show that thereafter, prior to the attachment, he became a nonresident.[78] Defendant's certificate of automobile registration made ante litem motam may be considered;[79] and where defendant's absence is shown he may testify that it was only temporary and that he intended to come back to live.[80]

(4) Fraudulent Transfer or Disposition of Property

Any proper evidence tending to prove or disprove a fraudulent transfer or disposition of property is competent.

The evidence should be confined to the ground of attachment alleged; and where the only ground alleged is that defendant was about to make a fraudulent disposition, evidence as to past conveyances or sales is admissible only as it tends to show further contemplated conveyances and characterize them as fraudulent.[81] Evidence of conveyances forced upon him is incompetent; only voluntary conveyances may be shown.[82]

On the issue of fraudulent intent, it is permissible to show the acts and declarations of the debt-

or,[83] whether before or after the attachment,[84] or before or at the time of the transfer alleged to be fraudulent,[85] and it has also been held permissible to show his acts and declarations subsequent to such transfer.[86] But declarations of the transferee are not sufficient to show an intent to defraud on the part of the transferor.[87] On the issue of fraudulent intent it is also competent to show the insolvency of the debtor,[88] a failure to keep systematic books of account,[89] an assignment previously made,[90] the withholding of a deed or mortgage from record,[91] and false or contradicting statements made by the debtor[92] or by the transferee;[93] but the mere fact that defendant was embarrassed in his pecuniary affairs and was pressed for money when the writ issued cannot be shown unless the relevancy of such evidence is shown by its connection with some question of fraud.[94] Defendant may be asked whether his intention was to put the property beyond the reach of his creditors,[95] and a third person may be questioned as to the purpose for which he looked over defendant's property, when it is claimed that the purpose was to receive it by way of fraudulent conveyance.[96] So plaintiff may question the person to whom the goods were conveyed as to the price paid, to determine the question of defendant's good faith, and the memory of the witness may be refreshed by showing him an invoice of the goods.[97]

Defendant's account books have been held not admissible to prove intent,[98] although they are competent to show the amount of indebtedness.[99]

As tending to disprove fraudulent intent defendant may show his own acts prior to the application for attachment, which tend to establish his intention to pay his debts, and that all the money received by him in his business, other than that necessary for his family, was used to pay his debts,[1] so he may show his own lack of knowledge regarding his indebtedness,[2] or that the attaching creditor holds collateral security for the debt;[3] but he cannot testify that a certain act, done by him after the attachment, was caused thereby, where nothing appears to show that this was other than a secret and uncommunicative motive,[4] or introduce evidence of secret instructions given only to his employees in regard to the conduct of the business.[5] Neither should proof of his subsequent payment of debts be allowed.[6] General knowledge in the neighborhood of his purpose to dispose of his property is admissible in behalf of defendant,[7] but a witness for him cannot testify that he had heard no suspicions expressed by others that defendant was trying to defraud his creditors.[8]

An offer to convey property to the attaching creditor in settlement of his debt and the refusal of such offer cannot be shown.[9]

Conduct towards other creditors

Evidence that defendants had refused to pay or secure debts to others than plaintiff, that judgment had been obtained against them, and that they had not acted as honest men ordinarily would have done has been held not objectionable, on the ground of it being immaterial how defendants were indebted to others, or because it related to a part only of defendants—Dent v. 9. Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Eborn, 4 So. 386, 84 Ala. 529.

In an action on an attachment bond, where the attachment was based on the fraudulent transfer or disposition of property, defendant in attachment may testify as to the consent of plaintiff in attachment so to dispose of certain property and the latter may then testify that the attachment was not grounded on the disposition of that particular property.[10]

(5) Removal or Concealment of Property

Evidence of acts, declarations, or omissions of the defendant is competent when it tends to prove or disprove actual or intended removal or concealment of property to defeat creditors.

Where the attachment is based on the ground of removal of property to defraud creditors, any evidence tending to show that defendant was removing his property, and that at the time he was clouding the title as to a part of the property so to be removed is admissible to show fraudulent intent on his part;[11] and where the attachment is based on the ground of intended removal, testimony of any declaration or admission of defendant tending to show an intention on his part to leave the jurisdiction, or to remove his property therefrom, or to defeat his creditors in the collection of his indebtedness to them, is competent evidence, but testimony by plaintiff in his own behalf, that another witness had stated that defendant told him he was about to remove property, and that plaintiff believed such statement, is immaterial and incompetent.[12]

Failure to keep a cash book may be evidence of concealment in a doubtful case,[13] and the hiding of books of account is evidence of actual or threatened concealment where it was done by defendant's authority;[14] but evidence of the amount of money paid by defendant to plaintiff during their business dealings is not admissible on the question of fraudulent concealment,[15] and the fact that defendant once dealt, or was suspected of having dealt, in counterfeit money has no bearing on the issue.[16]

Defendant may show in his own behalf that he had paid out large sums to creditors during the year preceding the levy,[17] or that at the time the attachment was sued out he was a man of large means, and had a large amount of property about him and under his control, claiming it openly and notoriously as his own,[18] but where plaintiff has shown certain judgments against defendant and executions issued thereon, and introduced the testimony of the officer that defendant told them, when they were sent to him to collect the judgment, that he had no property subject to execution, it is not proper to permit defendant to show that such judgments were against him as an accommodation indorser.[19]

(6) Fraud in Incurring Liability

Fraudulent statements relied on by the plaintiff are admissible in evidence, but offers by the defendant to settle the plaintiff's claim are not.

Statements made to commercial agencies by the debtor, as to his financial standing, are admissible in evidence on the question of fraud in contracting the debt,[20] provided they were made with a fraudulent purpose,[21] and were relied on by plaintiff;[22] but offers on the part of defendant to settle plaintiff's claim have no bearing on the question and are not admissible in evidence.[23]

(7) Insufficient Property in State to Satisfy Demand

Evidence showing the defendant was about to dispose of property with intent to defeat the creditors is competent.

Where the attachment is grounded on insufficiency of property in the state to meet plaintiff's demand, evidence tending to establish that defendant was about to dispose of property with intent to defeat creditors can be considered in determining whether or not the collection of plaintiff's demand would be endangered by delay in obtaining judgment or return of no property found.[24]

Opinion of plaintiff's agent that plaintiff was not in danger of losing anything when agent turned account over to attorneys for collection is immaterial in determining whether attachment would issue on the ground that debtor had insufficient property subject to execution to satisfy plaintiff's demand and that collection of demand would be endangered by delay in obtaining judgment or return of no property found.—Cannon Ball Cab & Bus Co. v. (3) Fraudulent transfer or disposition of property
(4) Removal or concealment of property
(5) Fraud in incurring liability
(6) Insufficient property in state to satisfy plaintiff's demand

(1) In General

The grounds of attachment must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence

Plaintiff's burden of proving the grounds of his attachment must be sustained by a preponderance of the evidence,[25] but he is entitled to his attachment if he establishes any one of the statutory grounds.[26] These rules have been applied in considering the weight and sufficiency of evidence to sustain an attachment on the ground that defendant is a nonresident,[27] as well as on other grounds hereinafter more fully discussed.

(2) Absconding, Absence, or Concealment

Although the creditor must establish absconding or concealment by a preponderance of the evidence, positive proof is not necessary.

The general rules considered in the preceding section apply where the attachment is based on the ground that the debtor has absconded, absented, or concealed himself.[28] Positive proof is not necessary to make out a concealment;[29] but evidence of a mere failure to find the debtor does not show concealment,[30] unless, perhaps, where diligent search has been made without success[31]

(3) Fraudulent Transfer or Disposition of Property

A fraudulent conveyance need not be positively proved but may be shown by circumstances or inferred from the acts and conduct of the defendant; however, there must be something more than mere surmise or appearance of fraud.

When an attachment is based on the ground that defendant had fraudulently transfered or disposed of his property, or was about to do so, the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact[32] which must depend largely upon the particular facts and circumstances of each case.[33] It is not necessary that such intention should be positively proved, but it may be shown by circumstances or inferred from the acts and conduct of the party[34] by an application of the rule that a person is presumed to intend the necessary and natural consequences of his voluntary acts;[35] and an instruction that fraud is not lightly imputed but must be plainly proved requires too high a degree of proof.[36] However, there must be something more than mere surmise[37] or appearance of fraudulent intent;[38] and indeed it has been said generally that circumstances which may create a strong suspicion of fraudulent intent, but yet fall short of prima facie proof, are not sufficient.[39]

The fraudulent intent of a debtor may be inferred from his threats not to pay if sued, or to dispose of his property,[40] or from a failure to carry out a promise as to the application of specific property.[41]

It is not sufficient to establish a fraudulent intent that defendant is heavily indebted, and repeated efforts to serve him with summons have failed,[42] that he made a promise to pay which he had no reasonable expectation of being able to keep,[43] that he has failed to pay a debt according to his promise,[44] that he has made no effort to pay the debt sued on,[45] that he has refused to secure a creditor;[46] that he has offered to sell his prop-

Proof that defendant had more than enough cash in a bank to satisfy the debt is not proof that he had no intention to convey or dispose of his property.[70]

Consideration for intended transfer. No inference of fraudulent intent is justified where a contemplated transfer is to be made for an adequate consideration;[71] but such an inference may be drawn from the fact that the transfer is to be gratuitous,[72] or for an insignificant price.[73]

Threatened assignment. Fraudulent intent is not necessarily shown from the fact that a debtor threatens to make an assignment,[74] even though preferences are contemplated therein,[75] but the circumstances under which the threat is made may justify an inference of fraud.[76]

(4) Removal or Concealment of Property

Removal or concealment of property may be sufficiently proved by evidence of acts or declarations of the defendant.

The general rules as to weight and sufficiency of evidence apply in determining whether plaintiff is entitled to an attachment on the ground of removal or concealment of property.[77] So it has been held that concealment was made out by evidence that defendant boasted that he had money in a safe place and would not pay,[78] or that he was going to sell everything and leave and that plaintiff would collect nothing,[79] and by evidence of a hurried division of property followed by placing it in various different places.[80] It is necessary only to show that defendant concealed or was guilty of conduct which was intended to and calculated to conceal,[81] and proof of failure to make a return of a large cash sale of goods consigned to a debtor by his creditor to sell and account for the proceeds,[82] or of the transmission of money through the post office[83] tends to show concealment.

Receipt of a large amount of merchandise, which was not accounted for in a subsequent assignment to creditors, is not in itself sufficient, however, to support allegations of fraudulent concealment;[84] and a mere showing of departure from the state is insufficient—it must further be shown that property was concealed or removed from the state with fraudulent intent.[85]

A delay of two weeks between the time of the execution and filing of affidavits charging that defendant was about to convert his property into money and place it beyond the reach of his creditors does not authorize the inference that the facts stated had ceased to exist when the affidavits were filed.[86]

Threatened removal is proved by evidence of an attempted assignment of a bank deposit representing money stolen by defendant from plaintiff.[87]

Removal from the state is not proved by evidence merely showing the issuance of bills of lading covering interstate shipments naming defendant as consignor and a third person as consignee, since the presumption is that title of the goods passed from defendant to the consignee on delivery to the carrier and that the carrier then removed the goods for the consignee, and not for the consignor.[88]

Giving up business
Proof that a resident of the state gave up his business and engaged passage by sea to Australia did not make out a removal of his property to defraud his creditors, justifying an attachment, especially where substantially all his property was left in local banks and trust companies and all known debts were paid—O'Rourke v. Rankin, 134 N Y.S. 845, 193 App Div 494.

(5) Fraud in Incurring Liability

Circumstantial evidence may sufficiently prove fraud in incurring liability.

Where an attachment is grounded on defendant's fraud in contracting the debt or incurring liability, the fraudulent intent of defendant in incurring the liability may be gathered from circumstantial evidence;[89] and it is not necessary to show that defendant disposed of his property with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors.[90]

(6) Insufficient Property in State to Satisfy Plaintiff's Demand

To invalidate attachment grounded on insufficient property to meet the plaintiff's demand, the defendant must clearly show sufficient property.

Where an attachment is granted on the ground that defendant has insufficient property in the state to satisfy plaintiff's demand, defendant must make a clear disclosure of sufficient property to invalidate the attachment.[91]

§ 70. Waiver or Loss of Right to Assert

A creditor may lose his right to assert various grounds of attachment by failure timely to prosecute it, by accepting security or benefits from the debtor, or by waiving other rights on which the remedy depends.

A creditor loses his right to an attachment based on the ground of the debtor's fraudulent disposition of his property by failure to seek it within a reasonable time after the transfer relied on,[92] or within the statutory period thereafter if one is prescribed.[93] So one accepting benefits under a fraudulent assignment for the benefit of creditors cannot avail himself of it as a ground for attachment.[94] Where plaintiff waives the right to demand payment of goods on delivery, he loses his right to an attachment on the ground that defendant has failed or refused to pay the price of goods delivered under a contract requiring payment on delivery.[95] And in some jurisdictions, as has been shown supra in §§ 17, 60, a creditor who would otherwise be entitled to the remedy of attachment loses his right by accepting security for his demand.

Negligence on the part of plaintiff in failing to discover the truth of false representations on which he relied will not, however, defeat his right to an attachment on the ground of fraud in incurring the liability.[96]

III. PROPERTY SUBJECT TO ATTACHMENT

§ 71. In General

All goods and chattels of a defendant are subject to attachment for his debts unless exempted by statute or some broad principle of law or public policy.

Except such property as is exempted by statutes, which will be discussed in the titles Exemptions §§ 26-69 [25 C.J. p 42 note 57-p 93 note 64] and Homesteads §§ 52-92 [29 C.J. p 821 note 75-p 855 note 2], or by virtue of some broad principle of law or public policy (see infra § 74 b), all the goods and chattels of a defendant are subject to attachment for his debts.[97]

§ 72. Personal Property and Interests Therein in General

Personal property to be liable to attachment must be of such character that it would be liable to seizure under execution, and defendant must have some right or title thereto.

The general rule is that in order for personal property to be liable to seizure under attachment, it is necessary that it should be of such character that it would be liable to be seized under execution,[98] and that defendant in the attachment proceeding should have some right or title, legal or equitable, thereto,[99] and where an attachment is levied on goods not belonging to the attachment debtor, the attachment will not hold such goods even though such debtor afterward acquires title thereto.[1] However, it has been held immaterial that the precise right or interest of defendant is unknown to the plaintiff or to the attaching officer at the time of seizure,[2] although only the interest which the debtor has at the time the attachment is sought can be attached.[3]

Tests applied. It has been said that if an interest can be disposed of by will, contract, or other conveyance under the statute, there would seem to be no valid objection to its attachment,[4] and a usual test as to whether attachment will lie is as to whether the debtor in the attachment suit could have sued to recover the property against which the attachment is directed.[5]

Possession in defendant or in third person. The mere fact that the attachment defendant is in possession of property does not render it subject to the attachment, when such possession is held under another who is the true owner.[6] However, the fact that property of the attachment defendant is in the possession of a third person does not usually exempt it from attachment,[7] although it has been held that where property has been bailed for hire for a specific time a creditor of the bailor cannot attach the property and take it from the custody of the bailee during the term of such bailment,[8] and that property in the possession of a bailee having a lien thereon cannot be taken from his possession on attachment against the bailor.[9] On the other hand, it has been held that one who is in possession of property as a bailee merely cannot recover its possession as against attaching creditors of the real owner,[10] and that property in the hands of a bailee in excess of the amount necessary to satisfy the bailee's lien may be reached by attachment,[11] and, where the statute so provides, property in the hands of a bailee may be attached subject to the right of the bailee to retain possession during the term of the bailment.[12]

Previous title or ownership of defendant in attachment will not subject the property to seizure if he has parted with such title or ownership prior to the institution of the attachment proceeding,[13] and there is no showing of any fraudulent intent in the transfer of the title.[14]

Mere contingent interests or remote possibilities are not the subject of attachment.[15]

Attachment against grantee pending suit to set aside conveyance. Liens obtained by creditors of a grantee by virtue of attachment writs against him, issued during the pendency of a suit by others against him to set aside a deed to him, are unavailing against such complainants, the deed being set aside.[16]

§ 73. —— Pledged, Mortgaged or Encumbered Personal Property

a. In general
b Mortgaged property
c Pledged property

a. In General

Personal property on which there exist encumbrances in an amount equivalent to, or greater than, the value thereof is not subject to attachment.

Transfer from son to mother

(1) Where no part of the property transferred by a son to his mother was made subject to the levy of attachment, it is immaterial whether or not there was an immediate delivery followed by an actual continued change of possession as required by statute in order to prevent the transfer from being deemed void —Bosbyshell v Cline, 196 P 274, 51 Cal App 109

(2) The fact that the attachment debtor, who was employed by his mother on a salary to manage her dairy farm, gave in his own name a mortgage for part of the purchase price of cattle paid for with the mother's money, does not subject such stock to attachment for the son's debts.—Bosbyshell v. Cline, supra.

(3) The fact that a son, when asking for exemption from military duty, claimed his mother was dependent on him, if competent evidence in determining the right to attach property as his under a writ levied before he made such claim, has no weight to show his ownership of the property, where the mother was more than seventy years of age and feeble, so that she might be dependent on him, although she had property sufficient for her support.—Bosbyshell v. Cline, supra.

16. Kinnah v. Kinnah, 56 N E. 376, 184 Ill. 284.

Personal property on which there exist vendor's liens for unpaid purchase money in an amount equivalent to, or greater than, the value thereof is not subject to attachment, defendant in such case, having no attachable interest therein.[17]

b. Mortgaged Property

(1) In general
(2) Property in possession of mortgagee
(3) Interest of mortgagee

(1) In General

Generally, mortgaged personal property is subject to attachment, when in the hands of the mortgagor.

While at common law the mortgagor of personalty was held not to have such an interest therein that the chattel could be taken by attachment in an action against him;[18] at the present time the interest of a mortgagor of chattels is, in a number of states, held subject to attachment,[19] either because of the recognition of a legal, as well as an equitable, right of property in the mortgagor,[20] or by virtue of statutes, on compliance with the conditions thereof.[21] The courts are not, however, uniform in determining just what interest the mortgagor must have in the property before it is attachable. It is usually held liable so long as the mortgagor's direct interest is coupled with the legal right to possession;[22] and in some jurisdictions, possession or possessory right to the chattel is expressly adjudged to be essential,[23] and the right does not exist after condition broken.[24] In other jurisdictions the statutes seem to authorize the attachment of mere equities of redemption,[25] and the mortgagor's interest would, it has been held, be attachable after condition broken.[26]

Mortgage lien waived. Personal property on which a mortgagee has waived his lien, by permitting its removal to another state, has been held subject to attachment by the mortgagor's creditors on its arrival in the other state.[27]

(2) Property in Possession of Mortgagee

Generally, personal property that is mortgaged and in the hands of the mortgagee is not subject to attachment.

If by virtue of the mortgage the mortgagee is in rightful possession of the property, it cannot as a rule be taken on an attachment against the mortgagor,[28] especially after the time for payment has expired and the mortgage has, by its terms, become absolute.[29] However, it has been considered that if the property has not been applied to the satisfaction of the claim it would be attachable when in the possession of the mortgagee,[30] and, under statutes in some jurisdictions, property that is mortgaged and is in the possession of the mortgagee is not exempt from attachment;[31] further, although the mortgagee cannot be deprived of his possession, he cannot complain of a lawful levy.[32]

Equity of redemption

32. Briggs v. Briggs, (Tex.Civ.App.) 227 S.W. 511.

(3) Interest of Mortgagee

Mortgaged personalty not applied in satisfaction of the debt is not subject to attachment by the mortgagee's creditors.

Personal property, while the possession or right of redemption remains in the mortgagor, is not only not liable to attachment in a suit against the mortgagee[33] but, it would seem, cannot be thus taken, although the mortgagee has possession, and after condition broken, if it has not in fact been applied to the satisfaction of the debt by foreclosure or otherwise.[34]

c. Pledged Property

Conflict of authority exists as to whether property pledged is subject to attachment by pledgor's creditors, in absence of statutes.

While it has been held that a chattel, pledged on sufficient consideration, is not liable to attachment in an action against a pledgor,[35] it has also been held that personal property that is pledged is liable to an attachment in an action against the pledgor on discharging the debt for which the property is held as security.[36] The statutes in some jurisdictions authorize attachment of such property on discharge of the debt secured by the pledge[37] and although the pledgee cannot be deprived of his possession, he cannot complain of a lawful levy of attachment.[38]

Attachment by pledgee. Property pledged to secure a debt or obligation may be attached by the pledgee as the property of the pledgor,[39] notwithstanding the obligation is not fixed and certain and the pledgee is not in possession.[40]

The interest of the pledgee has been held to be attachable in an action against him by his creditors.[41]

Consideration sufficient
Property pledged, to secure a person for the liability incurred in procuring the discharge of other property of the debtor which had been attached, is supported by a sufficient consideration and is not subject to attachment by other creditors of the pledgor.—Thompson v. Stevens, 10 Me. 27.

"The law is universal that the pledgor of personal property still retains ownership of the goods, qualified, of course, by the rights of the pawnee The pledgee, by taking the goods into his possession, becomes a lienor to the extent of the debt for which he holds the goods as security The interest of the owner or pledgor is a vendible property interest, subject to the pledge, and is as much a proper subject of attachment and levy of execution against the owner as any other property rights of the proprietor"—Ottumwa Nat. commerce,[43] tools of a mechanic,[44] merchandise kept in a store for sale,[45] fixtures which a tenant may remove,[46] hay in a barn,[47] and a sealed parcel or locked safety deposit box belonging to defendant.[48] It seems that property in a trade-mark is not subject to attachment apart from the business in which it is used.[49]

Alimony. Money received by a wife from her husband under an agreement, as her share of their estate in full settlement of her rights, including alimony, has been held not exempt from attachment as constituting alimony, a divorce being subsequently granted for her fault and without any allowance to her,[50] and property received by a wife as alimony is subject to attachment by a creditor whose judgment was obtained for a wrong which followed the divorce decree.[51]

Rent notes, payable to a mortgagor under a lease of the property during the year allowed for redemption after mortgage foreclosure sale, have been held not exempt from attachment on other debts.[52]

(2) Bank Deposits

A bank deposit may, ordinarily, be attached as in the case of other personalty

As a deposit is a debt due from the bank to the depositor, it may be attached by the depositor's creditors like any other property belonging to him,[53] and when it is so attached, it becomes the bank's duty to retain the deposit until the court has made a proper order concerning its disposition.[54] After a deposit has been attached, the bank cannot apply it on an unmatured debt due to itself.[55]

(3) Money

Money, in specie or bank notes, may be subject to attachment.

Money,[56] whether in specie,[57] treasury notes,[58] or bank notes,[59] is subject to attachment.

(4) Commingled Goods

Goods of a debtor intermingled with those of another are subject to attachment.

If the goods of a debtor are so intermingled with those of another that they cannot be distinguished or identified, the whole mass may be taken by attachment in an action against the debtor.[60] The officer may, however, retain possession of the goods other than the debtor's only until they are identified or pointed out to him.[61]

(5) Growing Crops

A conflict of authority exists as to whether growing, immature crops may be attached.

While in at least one jurisdiction, a growing, immature crop has been held not properly attachable,[62] in other jurisdictions annual growing crops which are the product of industry and care have been held to be properly attachable as the personal property of the owner,[63] although it has been considered that, in order to be attachable, such crops should be fit for harvest.[64]

(6) Perishable Property

Statutes in some jurisdictions permit perishable goods to be attached.

While perishable goods have been held not subject to attachment,[65] some statutes permit such property to be seized under this process, and make provision for its sale so that the proceeds may stand in its place;[66] and it has also been held that such goods may be seized, although no provision is made for their sale.[67]

(7) Rolling Stock and Income of Carriers

Rolling stock of carriers may be attached when not in use.

The engines or the freight and passenger cars of a railroad corporation are liable to attachment when not in use, the same as other personal property,[68] and the same has been true of a stagecoach not actually in transit.[69]

The income and revenues of a railroad company which are pledged for the payment of outstanding bonds are not liable to attachment by creditors of the company, and equity will enjoin an attempted levy thereon.[70]

(8) Water Craft

Steamboats and other vessels may be attachable.

As a general rule there is no discrimination between vessels or steamboats and other species of personal property, when the kind of property subject to attachment is considered.[71]

(9) Liquor License

Liquor license and the franchise evidenced thereby may be attached.

A statute authorizing the attachment of liquor licenses has been held to refer to both the certificate and the franchise evidenced thereby.[72] An amendment of a statute authorizing attachment of a liquor license so as to bind any renewal thereof has been held to apply only to attachments made after it went into effect.[73]

(10) Intoxicating Liquor

Attachment may be levied on intoxicating liquor lawfully kept.

Where the keeping of intoxicating liquor is lawful, such property may be attached like any other property.[74]

b. Goods Not Subject to Attachment

(1) In general
(2) Books of account and private papers

(1) In General

While certain property, by virtue of statutory provisions, is not subject to attachment as elsewhere shown in this work (see Exemptions, Homesteads), courts, on some broad principle of law or public policy, have also held certain property to be exempt from attachment (see infra § 74 b (2)–(9)).

(2) Books of Account and Private Papers

Books of account and private papers are generally not subject to attachment.

the creditor, have been held not subject to attachment.[75]

The private papers of a debtor have been held not attachable.[76]

(3) Property Illegally Kept

Authority is conflicting as to right to levy attachment on property illegally kept

Since an attachment can be made fully effective only by sale, and since such sale would defeat the right of forfeiture, which is often provided for, as well as violate the statute itself in jurisdictions where the sale of intoxicating liquor is prohibited, it has been held that such liquor is not subject to attachment,[77] although in some jurisdictions the attachment has been upheld, notwithstanding the statute, apparently on the ground that such property did not lose its character of property by being illegally kept for sale.[78]

(4) Property in Course of Manufacture

Attachment may not be levied on goods in the course of manufacture where effect would be to render goods nearly valueless.

It has been held that property cannot be attached when it is in such a state of manufacture that if taken it could not be returned to defendant in the same condition should plaintiff's claim fail,[79] or when it would be rendered nearly or entirely valueless by the arrest of the manufacturing process, and care or skill is required in its completion.[80]

(5) Property Carried or Worn by Person or Taken from Him

Attachment may not be levied on property carried or worn by a person so that it could not be taken without an assault or violating of his personal security.

Property which is being carried or worn by a person in such position or manner that it cannot be taken without an assault or violating his personal security is not liable to attachment.[81] However, money which is properly taken from a prisoner by the superintendent of a penitentiary, to which the prisoner, charged with robbing a bank, is taken for safekeeping, is not in the prisoner's possession or custody, but is sequestered and subject to attachment at the bank's instance, notwithstanding the money does not constitute a part of the identical bills stolen.[82]

(6) Property Held for Payment of Duty

Property in custody of federal government for nonpayment of duty is not liable to attachment.

Imported goods, while they are in the custody of the United States customhouse officials and before the duty thereon is paid or secured, are held to be not liable to attachment at the hands of a state officer.[83]

(7) Money Due from State

Attachment may not be levied on money due from the state to a defendant.

A fund in the hands of the state treasurer and alleged to be due from the state to defendant in attachment has been held not subject to attachment.[84]

(8) Property Used in Transportation of Mail

Any vehicle or vessel actually engaged in transportation of the mails is exempt from attachment.

The willful obstruction of the mails being expressly prohibited by congress, any vehicle or vessel which is actually engaged in such service is, during such time, exempt from attachment.[85]

(9) Copyright and Literary Property

Copyrights and literary property are not proper subjects of attachment.

A copyright is not subject to attachment,[86] and if the plate or physical means of reproduction is so seized and sold, the purchaser may not use it

c. Goods in Transit under Bill of Lading

By virtue of statutory provisions, goods in possession of a carrier under a negotiable bill of lading may not be subject to attachment until the bill is surrendered or its negotiation enjoined.

While, ordinarily, goods in transit are subject to attachment,[89] provided the owner has not lost control over the property and his right to change their destination,[90] under a federal statute and statutes in some jurisdictions practically identical therewith, goods shipped under a negotiable bill of lading are protected from attachment, while in the possession of the carrier, until the bill is surrendered or its negotiation enjoined, and compliance with these conditions is essential to render such goods subject to attachment.[91] However, where the consignee refused the bill of lading, such goods have been held subject to attachment, notwithstanding the bill of lading was assigned and not impounded,[92] and where the consignor uses a straight bill of lading, thereby retaining control over the goods, such goods are subject to attachment by the consignor's creditors while in possession of the carrier,[93] unless the consignor has previously transferred the bill of lading and notice thereof has been given to the carrier.[94]

§ 75. Real Property and Interests Therein in General

Real property of an attachment debtor is generally liable to seizure under the process.

While at common law an attachment, like an execution, would not run against land,[95] at the present time real property of a defendant in attachment proceedings is generally liable to seizure under the process,[96] unless by the terms of the statute it clearly appears that the intention of the legislature is otherwise.[97] However, the general rule is that for real property to be liable to attachment, it is necessary that it should be of such character that it would be liable to be seized under execution,[98] and also that the defendant in the attachment proceeding has some right or title, legal or equitable, thereto.[99]

§ 76. —— Exhaustion of Personal Property

In the absence of statute requiring it, the exhaustion of personalty is not necessary prior to seizure of realty.

In the absence of any positive statutory limitations exempting real estate from attachment until the debtor's personalty is exhausted, such lands would be liable to attachment regardless of the amount of personalty the debtor may possess.[1]

§ 77. —— Mortgaged Property

a. Interest of mortgagor
b. Interest of mortgagee

a. Interest of Mortgagor

The equity of redemption of a mortgagor of realty is now generally liable to attachment.

While the mortgagor's equity of redemption was usually held not liable to attachment at common law,[2] the rule has been very generally changed by statute so that at the present time such interest is attachable,[3] although in some jurisdictions, payment or tender of the amount due the mortgagee is essential (see infra § 233).

b. Interest of Mortgagee

While a mortgage is open and subsisting, the interest of a mortgagee is not subject to attachment.

The interest of the mortgagee in land, while the mortgage is open and subsisting is not of such nature as to be liable to attachment.[4] Some of the cases, however, seem to be limited to the particular facts before the court, and do not expressly affirm the nonliability of his interests to attachment after entry but before foreclosure;[5] but inasmuch as the inconveniences and difficulties which would result from the attachment before entry would still prevail in case of attachment after entry and before foreclosure,[6] the distinction, if ever made, does not rest on sound legal principles, and does not, it is believed, now exist.[7]

b. Estate by curtesy
c Unassigned dower
d. Remainders, reversions, and the like
e. Interest of preëmptioner or entryman of land

Levy on life estate to pay remainderman's debts

Levy of attachment on life estate in land to pay remainderman's debt is erroneous—First Nat Bank v Stabler, 223 N W. 794, 118 Neb. 142, followed in Rosalie State Bank v Stabler, 223 N W 796, 118 Neb. 148.

Transfer prior to attachment

Bank suing out attachment long after recording of valid deed to attachment debtor's husband had no lien on land for amount of wife's note.—Ballard v. Security State Bank, 293 S.W. 950, 219 Ky. 468.

Grantee assuming debt

An attachment lien on property may be properly granted to a creditor who erected a dwelling thereon, grantee having assumed grantor's obligation to creditor—McIntosh v. Turner, 39 S.W.(2d) 966, 239 Ky. 495.

Recording of instrument evidencing equitable interest not necessary

An instrument, although entitled to registration, need not be recorded unless required by statute in order to protect an equitable title, evidenced thereby, against attaching creditors of the holder of the legal title.—Johnson v. Unenforceable mortgage seizin,[9] has been held insufficient to constitute an attachable interest at least as against the equitable owners, where the attaching party has, or is bound by law to take, notice of the paramount outstanding equitable title,[10] real property within the meaning of the statutes has been held to include not only land and things erected or growing thereon, or affixed thereto, but all rights issuing out of, annexed to, and exercisable within or about, the land,[11] and generally, real property rights are subject to attachment process, although the precise right or interest of defendant is unknown to both plaintiff and attaching officer at the time of seizure and sale.[12]

The interest acquired by a judgment creditor in his levy on land has been held not attachable during the time allowed by law for its redemption;[13] and a purchaser at an execution sale has been held to have no attachable interest during the time allowed the debtor for redemption.[14]

b. Estate by Curtesy

Estate of tenant by curtesy initiate may be attached in the absence of statute to the contrary.

In the absence of a statute rendering it exempt,[15] the estate of a tenant by curtesy initiate is, like all other certain and vested legal estates, subject to attachment.[16]

c. Unassigned Dower

Dower interest not assigned or admeasured is not subject to attachment, in the absence of statutory provision permitting attachment thereof.

At common law and in the absence of statute showing a different legislative intent, a widow's interest in dower which has not been assigned or admeasured is not subject to attachment;[17] but a statute providing for the attachment of any interest in realty, which is capable of being aliened by defendant, whether vested or not vested, has been held to make such interest attachable.[18]

d. Remainders, Reversions, and the Like

Attachment may be levied on vested remainders, but not on uncertain and contingent interests in realty.

A vested remainder is such an interest as is subject to attachment;[19] but contingent remainders or other uncertain and contingent interests cannot be attached.[20]

It has been held that a reversionary interest in land is attachable.[21]

e. Interest of Preëmptioner or Entryman of Land

Interest of preemptioner of land is not liable to attachment.

Inasmuch as the interest of a preëmptioner of land is unassignable before the issue of the patent, such interest is not liable to attachment during that time.[22] Similarly, the interest of an entryman prior to compliance with all the preliminary acts prescribed by law for acquisition of title has been held not subject to attachment,[23] but where a claimant of land has been adjudged entitled to such land, although the deed has not been delivered pending his protest as to fees, it has been held that he had both legal and equitable title and an attachable interest therein.[24]

§ 79. Corporate Stock

In the absence of statutes so providing, shares of stock of a private corporation are not subject to attachment.

Stocks of a domestic or foreign corporation were not subject to levy at common law, and hence, in the absence of an enabling statute, are not liable to attachment.[25] However, in most jurisdictions, there are statutes by virtue of which shares of stock in incorporated companies may be attached.[26] While it has been held that statutes authorizing the attachment of corporate stock will not be extended by construction to include stock of a foreign corporation,[27] there is authority to the contrary.[28]

Legal or equitable interest. While it has been held, under some statutes, that only the legal and not the equitable interest is attachable,[29] statutes not only making shares of stock subject to attachment, but also rights in such stock, or option to acquire shares, or right or interest in such, have been held to include equitable as well as mere legal interests in stock.[30]

Certificates of stock While certificates of stock may, to some extent, be regarded as property, they are distinct from the holder's interest in the capital stock of the corporation, and are not "goods and effects" within the meaning of a statute relating to property subject to attachment,[31] and a stock certificate has been held not subject to attachment except in connection with a levy directly on the shares of stock.[32]

§ 80. Interest under Contract

a. In general
b. Lease

a. In General

Vested, but not contingent, interests under contracts may be attached.

In determining whether or not a contractual interest relative to property is of such nature as to be attachable each case must be governed by its own facts and statutory provisions relating to attachment. It would seem, however, that, when a debtor's pecuniary interest under a contract is dependent on a mere contingency,[33] it is not attachable, and this is apparently true even though the debtor is entitled to defend his possession against a wrongdoer or intruder;[34] but a vested and certain interest under a contract is attachable.[35] The right of an importer, who had parted with the title to goods, to regain the goods and title thereto on payment of a draft for the purchase price, has been held not such an interest in the property as was subject to attachment[36]

Appearance on corporate records
A statute providing for service of process for attachment of shares of corporate stock, stock options, or interest in stock, and requiring attaching officer to give certificate showing interest of debtor is intended merely to identify the shares of corporate stock, stock options, or rights, or interests in stock, when attached and sold, only when corporate records make identification possible and not as limiting rights or interests in corporate stock subject to attachment—Woods v. Spoturno, (Del.Super.) 183 A. 319.

Strict construction
Statutes providing for attachment of corporate stock are to be construed strictly as in derogation of the common law, and a case not plainly within the terms expressed cannot be considered as embraced therein, especially where courts of law and equity are separate tribunals, having separate jurisdictions.—Woods v. Spoturno, (Del.Super.) 183 A. 319.

Insurance policies. While, in some cases the assured's interest in an immatured policy of life insurance has been held not such as can be reached by attachment,[37] where the policy has, at the time the attachment is issued, a cash surrender value, it has been held that such interest may be attached,[38] under a statute authorizing attachment of specified property and "other property, real, personal and mixed"[39] However, an insured's option to take the surrender value of a policy has been held not evidence of a debt within the meaning of those words as used in a statute authorizing attachment, at least not until such option is exercised.[40]

Money due on a matured insurance policy written by an ordinary life insurance company on the life of a husband, and payable to his wife, is subject to levy under a warrant of attachment issued against the property of the wife in an action to recover a debt owing by her.[41]

Where a mortgagee clause is expressly limited to insurance on a building, insurance on personal property, after loss, is subject to attachment.[42]

Interest under conditional sales contract. While in the absence of statute, it has been held that the interest of the buyer under a conditional sales contract is not subject to attachment,[43] especially where he is in default,[44] and the seller has repossessed himself of the property for the default of the buyer,[45] it has also been held, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, that the interest of a buyer in possession and not in default is subject to attachment,[46] and such an attachment it not rendered illegal because of any erroneous view the officer may have had as to the extent of the debtor's interest.[47]

b. Lease

Interest of a lessee may, in a proper case, be attached, depending on provisions of lease and terms of the statutes relating to attachment.

The interest of a lessee in a lease of property may, in a proper case, be attached,[48] and whether or not property or an interest therein held under a lease is attachable in an action against the lessee is dependent not only on the statute, but on the terms of the lease as well.[49] Under a statute making only such property attachable as is subject to execution, it has been held that a leasehold estate is not attachable where it does not give the lessee general power to sublet.[50] If by the terms of the lease the property or produce is to be held for rent at the disposal of the lessor, who may enter and take it in case of a default, it would seem that such an agreement, not being accompanied by a delivery of possession, would not hold against the lessee's creditors, who could, before such entry, maintain an attachment on the term demised.[51] On the other hand, if the agreement is such that the property or produce is to remain in the lessor until the payment of the rent, and no entry is required to vest it in him,[52] or if the right of the lessee to the property does not become perfected until a certain part of the contract is performed,[53] it would not be attachable as the tenant's.

§ 81. Equitable Estate or Interest in General

In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, equitable interests in land are not subject to attachment.

In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, it has been held that an attachment can only reach equitable assets that are capable of manual delivery,[54] and an equitable interest in land, not being capable of manual delivery and not liable to be taken in execution at common law, is still exempt from attachment.[55] In a number of jurisdictions, however, this rule has been changed by statutes under which such interests are attachable,[56] although in a few jurisdictions it is still necessary to resort to a court of equity to subject such interests to payment of a debt.[57]

§ 82. Property Held in Trust

Creditors of trustee may not attach property held by him merely as trustee. Property held in trust other than under a spendthrift trust is subject to attachment by creditors of beneficiary in some jurisdictions, but not in others.

While property held by a trustee, who is also the sole beneficiary under the trust, is attachable in an action against such trustee,[58] where a defendant holds the title to property merely as a trustee, it is not subject to attachment for his debts,[59] whether the trusteeship is active or passive,[60] and notwithstanding the fact that the attaching creditor had no notice of the trust prior to his attachment.[61] However, where credit was given in good faith because of the trustee's apparent title,[62] or where the trust was a secret trust,[63] it seems that the property would be subject to attachment in an action against the trustee; and this is the rule by virtue of statutes in some jurisdictions.[64]

By creditors of beneficiary. While the principal or interest of a trust estate, not a spendthrift trust, has been held subject to attachment,[65] it has also been held that the proceeding to reach trust income should be in equity and not in law and attachment,[66] and under the statutes in some jurisdictions, the income of a trust fund may not be levied on under a warrant of attachment.[67]

Fiscal agent

Funds deposited by a corporation with a fiscal agent pursuant to indentures providing for such deposits to cover payments on due dates of interest and principal on the corporation's notes, being funds held in trust for noteholders, were not subject to attachment, even as to unclaimed deposits, where the corporation had not furnished the agent funds to advertise intended return of such deposits to corporation pursuant to provisions of indentures authorizing agent to so advertise at the corporation's expense before returning deposits, and the corporation had moreover defaulted in interest payment and hence was not entitled to return of deposits.—Finn v. Property held not trust property

Property adjudicated to be a wife's sole and separate estate in a divorce decree, no specific amount being awarded for support of children, has been held not to be trust property in favor of the children so as to render it not subject to attachment by the wife's creditor—Zander v. has been held not attachable by the creditors of the cestui que trust[68] in an action at law.[69]

§ 83. Interest Secured by Lien

The interest of a factor secured by a lien on goods consigned to him for sale is not attachable.

The interest of a factor secured by a lien on goods consigned to him for sale is not attachable by the creditors of the factor.[70]

§ 84. Interest of Heir or Distributee

Interest of heirs and distributees is generally subject to attachment.

The interest of heirs or distributees in the property descended is attachable,[71] and where there are several heirs, the undivided interest of one of them may be attached,[72] and the attachment cannot be defeated by any partition among them, or any assignment of the debtor's share to the other heirs,[73] although where, pending the settlement of the estate, advancements were made to an heir with the assent of the coheirs, which were accepted as in full of his share, such heir thereafter has no attachable interest in the real estate of the decedent.[74]

§ 85. Interest of Devisee or Legatee

Vested interest of devisee or legatee is generally subject to attachment.

Although the question is dependent on statute, and the authorities are not uniform, the more general rule appears to be that the interest of a devisee or legatee, when vested, is subject to attachment,[75] although the property is still in the hands of the executor or administrator of the testator for the payment of debts.[76] However, a judgment creditor of a predeceased devisee cannot proceed directly by attachment but must claim through the devisee's administrator.[77]

§ 86. Rights of Action in General

Under statutes in most jurisdictions, a chose in action is now subject to attachment.

At common law, a debt or chose in action could not be attached,[78] but under statutes in most jurisdictions, a debt or chose in action is subject to attachment as the property of the person to whom such debt is due,[79] and this has been held true al-

Present right to future possession

Present right of son and grandchildren of testator to future possession of portion of estate held by life tenant, being vested, is subject to attachment.—Wheaton Coal Co. v. Harris, 135 A. 637, 288 Pa. 294.

Possibility not coupled with an interest

Under will by which testator devised equitable estates tail to his children, grandchild's interest in trust estate during his father's lifetime was held a possibility not coupled with an interest, and hence not subject to attachment.—Sackett v. Paine, 128 A. 209, 46 R.I. 439.

Consignor's right to an accounting by an agent is intangible property which is subject to attachment.—Raftes v. Argyropulo, 206 N.Y.S. 284, 123 Misc. 738.

Money payable on a contingency

(1) Contract to produce rodeo for sum payable in installments gave rise to no property right in nature of chose in action or cause of action subject to attachment before payments were due or earned.—Sheehy v. Madison Square Garden Corporation, 193 N.E. 633, 266 N.Y. 44, reversing 272 N.Y.S. 433, 241 App.Div. 504.

(2) A contract interest in future profits has been held a contingent right, not subject to attachment as though the debt is due by plaintiff himself;[80] but with respect to this latter proposition it should be noted that there is contrary authority.[81] Where the statute so provides, debts secured by bills of exchange or negotiable notes are exempt from attachment.[82]

While a judgment in favor of the attachment debtor has been held not subject to levy,[83] it has also been held that a money judgment, whether in a contract or tort action, is subject to attachment as a "debt, cause of action or demand,"[84] but a cause of action for personal injuries is not attachable as a "debt" or "chose in action" such as might be classed as personal property.[85]

Credit arrangements. Where the owner of property made arrangements for an advancement of money on his orders for the erection of a building and gave a mortgage as security, nonpayment of an order has been held to create an indebtedness subject to attachment,[86] but where all orders are paid, money not advanced under the agreement has been held not subject to attachment to satisfy the claims of laborers and materialmen, the owner not performing his part of such agreement,[87] and a credit arranged for the benefit of third persons to be paid on certain conditions performed by defendant in attachment proceedings has been held not subject to attachment.[88]

§ 87. Instrument or Security for Payment of Money

Generally, promissory notes, bonds, etc., are attachable

As a general rule, instruments evidencing a debt and providing for the payment of money such as promissory notes,[89] bonds,[90] and county orders[91] are attachable. However, an undelivered check, draft, or bond is not subject to attachment.[92]

§ 88. Property in Custody of the Law

a Rule stated
b. Applications of rule

a. Rule Stated

As a general rule, property that is in custodia legis is not subject to attachment prior to fulfillment of the purpose for which it is held.

In the absence of statutes providing therefor, as a general rule, property that is in custodia legis is not subject to attachment[93] without leave of a cause of action—Fredrick v Chicago Bearing Metal Co., 224 N.Y.S. 629, 221 App.Div. 538, reversing 223 N.Y.S. 824, 130 Misc. 366

(7) Bankrupt's property after filing of petition see Bankruptcy § 140 [7 C.J. p 91 note 29].

(8) Property in possession of customhouse officials not attachable because of interference with government lien thereon see supra § 74 b (6).

Money taken from person of one arrested

(1) It has been held that, where an officer took property from the person of the prisoner in good faith, he may lawfully attach such property on a valid writ, no question being raised as to the property being in custodia legis—Closson v Morrison, 47 N H 482, 93 Am D. 459.

(2) Generally, property on the person of a prisoner that is taken over by the officer on the incarceration of such person is in custodia legis and not subject to attachment—Emmanuel v Sichofsky, 247 P. 205, 198 Cal 713, 48 A L R 580—Golden Gate Candy Products Co. v Superior Court in and for City and County of San Francisco, (Cal App) 36 P (2d) 834—Outerbridge Horsey Co v. (3) The exemption of such money on the person of the prisoner from attachment is based on public policy to prevent misuse of criminal process in causing arrests in order to reach such money—Emmanuel v. Sichofsky, 247 P. 205, 198 Cal. 713, 48 A L R. 580—Golden Gate Candy Products Co v. Superior Court in and for City of San Francisco, (Cal. App) 36 P (2d) 834.

(4) Such exemption terminates in some jurisdictions on final conviction of the prisoner in the criminal case, the purpose of the legal custody presumably being accomplished—Emmanuel v. Sichofsky, supra—Golden Gate Candy Products Co. v. Superior Court in and for City and County of San Francisco, supra

(5) As to the preceding proposition, there is authority to the contrary—Outerbridge Horsey Co. v. Martin, 120 A 235, 142 Md 52

(6) Money taken from a person arrested and held in lieu of bond without the amount of the bond required being entered on the docket or any entry showing the deposit to meet the recognizance as fixed has been held to be the property of the accused and subject to attachment—Puchuneicz v. 6 C J p 220 note 21 [h].

When property not in custody of law

(1) Mortgaged personality is not in custodia legis, so as to prevent attachment thereof pending foreclosure suit, where mortgagee had no receiver appointed, although mortgagor was enjoined from transferring or encumbering property before attachment creditor intervened—Griffiths v Thrasher, 26 P.(2d) 983, 95 Mont. 238

(2) Money in sheriff's possession for redemption of property sold under mortgage foreclosure is subject to attachment by creditor of holder of certificate of sale, where no duty rests on sheriff except to pay money to such holder.—Allen v. Larson, (N. D.) 256 N W. 178

(3) Money paid to a deputy sheriff by a corporate defendant's attorney to dissolve attachments as loan to a corporation rather than for the officer's indemnification is subject to successive attachments against the corporation while the officer held the money—Lipsitt v. Walmsley, (Mass) 193 N E 792.

(4) Where land was converted by sale by a master in partition and distribution of the proceeds was made and confirmed, but before money was paid the share of one distributee was attached in the master's hands, it was held that the money was not in custodia legis and was attachable—Piper v. 97. Union Bank & Trust Co. of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles County, (Cal App) 38 P (2d) 442.

(1) Property Delivered on Claimant's Bond

Property redelivered after seizure, on a bond conditioned to hold the property subject to an order of the court, is not attachable.

Where property is delivered to a claimant on the execution of a forthcoming or delivery bond, if the bond is conditioned to hold the property subject to the order of the court,[98] or to return the property, should claimant fail in his claim,[99] such property would not be attachable. On the other hand, if the bond operates as an absolute discharge of the property and a relinquishment of the lien thereon it would then be liable to a subsequent attachment,[1] in the absence of a statute declaring otherwise.[2]

(2) Property Held under Prior Levy

In the absence of statutes so providing, property held by an officer under a levy is generally not subject to attachment.

Property which is held by an officer under a levy of a valid writ of attachment is in the constructive possession of the court and, pending such litigation, has been held not subject to attachment by another officer,[3] although under the statutes of some states, an officer may attach such property subject to the operation of the first attachment,[4] and, since this rule arises from the unwillingness of the court to allow its jurisdiction or administration of justice to be interfered with, and no confusion will result from allowing the officer in possession to levy subsequent writs, such a levy is sometimes permitted.[5] If the attaching officer unlawfully releases his possession of the property,[6] or fails to take execution on it within the time prescribed by law,[7] it ceases to be within the custody of the law and becomes attachable.

Funds in the hands of an officer who collected them on execution are not subject to attachment.[8]

Surplus. The principle of custodia legis does not apply to a surplus which the officer has after satisfying the execution, and, therefore, where the property seized under the attachment greatly exceeds in value the claim under which it is seized, the excess, nothing else being in the way, is liable for the debtor's debts and may be seized under junior attachments.[9]

(3) Property Taken in Replevin

Property acquired by a claimant in a replevin suit on the giving of a proper bond therefor is not subject to attachment during the pendency of such suit.

Property acquired by a plaintiff in a claim and delivery action, which has not been finally determined, is not subject to attachment,[10] and, as a general rule, where property held by an officer under a levy is replevied from him by a claimant thereof and the proper bond given for its redelivery, it is not, during the pendency of the replevin suit, subject to attachment.[11] If, however, the levy and replevin suits are fraudulently brought, such property is not in custodia legis, and would be liable to attachment by bona fide creditors.[12]

§ 89. Property Fraudulently Conveyed

Attachment of property fraudulently conveyed is treated elsewhere in this work in the title Fraudulent Conveyances § 309 [27 C.J. p 706 note 42-p 708 note 65].

a. In General

The interest of a person in property held jointly with others is subject to attachment in an action against him.

The interest of a party in property held jointly with others is liable to attachment in an action against him, and an officer may take possession of the whole;[13] and it has been held that, if the enforcement of a joint liability is sought, the joint property of the debtors may be attached and sold, although summons is served on one of the debtors only.[14] Also, where, although the ownership and possession of a farm is joint, each cotenant's share of the crops has been set apart to him and is in his custody, the share of one cannot be taken under attachment by a creditor of another.[15]

b. As Tenants in Common

The interest of a tenant in common of property may be attached in an action against him.

The interest of a tenant in common of property may be attached in an action against him,[16] although such property is in the possession of the other tenant in common;[17] and the property may be removed, notwithstanding the rights arising between the parties from their agreements are thereby impaired.[18] Where the property so held in common is severable, an officer may lawfully seize and sever defendant's share therein.[19]

IV. PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE

A. JURISDICTION, VENUE, AND AUTHORITY TO ISSUE

§ 91. Jurisdiction in General

The jurisdiction of proceedings in attachment is dependent on, and is derived from, the statutes, and a compliance with the statutory procedure is essential.

Attachment proceedings being in derogation of the common law, jurisdiction thereof is special and limited, and courts, even those of general jurisdiction, cannot proceed by attachment unless the power rests on express statutory sanction.[20] Statutes granting this jurisdiction are to be construed strictly,[21] and the court can act only under the special power limited to it by the particular statute and according to the forms of procedure it prescribes.[22] Where jurisdiction is expressly conferred upon particular courts, this will not necessarily abolish the jurisdiction of other courts already recognized by law, as exclusive jurisdiction cannot be implied.[23] Where the statutes confer upon certain officers or courts all powers and jurisdiction to the same extent as they are possessed by other officers or designated courts, jurisdiction is thereby conferred by necessary implication upon the former to entertain proceedings by attachment when such jurisdiction is possessed by the courts whose powers furnish the measure of those which the act purports to confer.[24]

Since, as already noted in § 2, attachment is an extraordinary remedy, owing its existence entirely to statutory enactment, the jurisdiction of attachment proceedings cannot be legitimately exercised unless the attaching creditor pursues substantially the essential requirements of the statute.[25]

Although an attachment is authorized and is instituted under an act of the legislature, it does not prevent the debtor from showing irregularities in the issuance of the attachment.[26]

Meaning of jurisdiction. The term "jurisdiction," as used in attachment cases, refers both to the power of the court to move in any event by means of this particular process and to the authority to move in the proceeding, conceding the power to adopt the particular form of process, as dependent on compliance with the formalities prescribed, or the existence of peculiar grounds at the time the remedy is invoked.[27]

No presumption. The jurisdiction in attachment is placed on the same footing with that of courts of limited and special jurisdiction, and no presumption is indulged in its favor.[28]

§ 92. Necessity of Presence of Property

a. In general
b. Corporate stock
c. Debts
d. Judgments

a. In General

The property sought to be subjected to an attachment must be present within the territorial limits over which the court may exercise its power.

Since an attachment is somewhat in the nature of a proceeding in rem, in order that a court may have jurisdiction to attach property, it is indispensable that property owned or belonging to defendant be present,[29] actually or constructively,[30] within the territorial limits over which the court may exercise its power. Stating the rule conversely, the court cannot attach property which is not within the territorial limits of its jurisdiction.[31]

The issue of the writ and its levy on the property within the territorial limit of the court's jurisdiction brings the property under the jurisdiction of the court,[32] and also gives the court jurisdiction over defendant to the extent of the value of the property.[33] Where property is physically within the jurisdiction of the court, it is "present" so as to be subject to attachment, and, accordingly, where property which had been sold under a conditional sales contract remained in the state after the contract for its sale had been rescinded by resident plaintiff, there was jurisdiction to attach it.[34]

County warrants payable to bearer and capable of transfer without indorsement have been held seizable as the res in the state where they are found.[35]

Fraud or device. Even though property is physically present within the jurisdiction, the court will not attach it where it was fraudulently brought within its jurisdiction for the purpose of levying an attachment thereon.[36] It has even been held that actual fraud is not necessary to invoke this rule, and that if the jurisdiction over the property arises out of any device, stratagem, or arrangement by plaintiff by which the property is brought from a foreign state into the jurisdiction of the home court solely to give that court jurisdiction, the defense may be made that the jurisdiction was unfairly and illegally procured.[37]

b. Corporate Stock

Corporate stock is generally present, and subject to attachment, at the domicile of the corporation.

It seems to be well settled that, for purposes of attachment, the situs of shares of stock is within the state where the corporation resides, and that they may lawfully be levied on in such state.[38] Accordingly, the stock of a domestic corporation is subject to attachment in the state of its domicile, although it is owned by a nonresident,[39] and although the certificate of stock is in the possession of a debtor outside of the state;[40] and even where stocks of a domestic corporation are pledged by plaintiff debtor as security to a nonresident defendant creditor, they are present at the domicile of the corporation for purposes of attachment.[41]

According to some authority, the fact that a foreign corporation is doing business within the state does not create a presence of its stock within the state for purposes of attachment,[42] even though the statute authorizes the "attachment of the shares of the defendant in any corporation"[43] According to other authority, however, a statute authorizing attachment on "any" shares of stock authorizes an attachment on the shares of stock of a foreign corporation doing business within the state[44] Under this view, the certificate of stock has been considered as nothing more than the evidence of the interest held by the stockholder, and where he admits his ownership of such interest, the shares of stock of a foreign corporation doing business within the state are subject to attachment, even though the stock certificates are not within the state[45]

According to some authority shares of stock cannot be attached in a state other than the one which has granted the charter to the corporation[46] According to other authority the presence of the stock certificates of a foreign corporation in the state confers jurisdiction upon the courts of the state over the stock for attachment purposes[47]

Under the Uniform Stock Transfer Act the stock of a corporation must be attached, if at all, at the place where it is found.[48]

c. Debts

For purposes of attachment a debt may be regarded as having its presence either at the domicile of the debtor or at the domicile of the creditor.

As in the case of an attachment generally, a debt, in order that it may be attached, must be present within the jurisdiction of the court making the attachment, since a debt cannot be attached where its situs is foreign to the state in which the action is brought,[49] even though the evidence of the debt is within the state.[50] Conversely, where the statute gives a creditor living within the state the right to attach a debt, it is immaterial that the evidence of the debt is held in another state.[51]

Purchase of note

51. Olcott v. Guerinck, 19 Ohio Cir.

For purposes of attachment, a court may regard a debt as being present or having its situs at the domicile of the debtor, and subject to attachment there,[52] or it may regard the debt as being present at the domicile of the creditor and, consequently, subject to attachment there.[53] Even though both the debtor and the creditor have their domiciles outside the state, a debt is present within the state and subject to attachment therein if the debt arises from a contract made payable within the state issuing the attachment,[54] or where the debt is made payable in the state where the attachment is made and the nonresident defendant whose debt is attached is doing business within the state.[55] A debt due from a nonresident debtor temporarily within the state to a nonresident plaintiff, which arose outside of the state and thus had its situs there, is not attachable within the state,[56] and, similarly, a debt owing to a nonresident defendant by a foreign corporation doing business within the state, which arose outside of the state, cannot be attached in the state.[57]

d. Judgments

For purposes of attachment a judgment is generally regarded as being present in the state of its rendition.

It is generally held that a judgment has its legal situs in the state of its rendition and cannot be reached by attachment proceedings in another state, although the debt on which it is based had its situs in such state.[58]

Where, however, the only requirement in the attachment statute as to the situs of property made subject to attachment is that it must be "found" within the county in which the levy is made, a foreign judgment against a resident is an indebtedness "found" within the court's jurisdiction.[59]

§ 93. Jurisdiction of Subject Matter of Action

The court must have jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action in order to exercise jurisdiction of the attachment proceeding.

The jurisdiction over attachment proceedings is not entirely apart from and independent of the jurisdiction which the court may otherwise exercise over the subject matter of the suit, that is to say, if the cause of action itself is beyond the pale of the court's jurisdiction, such court cannot assume to exercise jurisdiction over the cause simply because the party has invoked it through the process of attachment,[60] and if, under particular circumstances, plaintiff may sue out an attachment, while in the absence of such circumstances he could not sue, as where the debt is not due, then, if the attachment is wrongly sued out because of the nonexistence of the required condition, the writ and the action must fall together.[61] So long, however, as the action remains pending, a failure to serve process in the main case does not result in a loss of jurisdiction over the attached property.[62]

Where no jurisdiction over the subject matter exists, mere consent to attachment cannot confer such jurisdiction.[63]

Amount in controversy. When the jurisdiction of particular causes, as between different courts, depends on the amount in controversy, the same consideration will control the power to proceed by attachment,[64] and for the purpose of determining jurisdiction it is the amount of the alleged indebtedness rather than the value of the property attached which governs.[65]

§ 94. Jurisdiction of Principal Action

Where the statute so requires, attachment must issue from the court wherein the principal action is brought or pending.

Where the statute so requires, the special proceeding by attachment must be in the same court as that in which the principal action is pending and to which the attachment is auxiliary.[66] In the absence of such a requirement, however, apparently the attachment proceeding may be in a court other than the one in which the principal action is pending.[67]

§ 95. Jurisdiction of Person of Defendant

Where jurisdiction of the person of the defendant is necessary, and it has not been acquired, no writ of attachment can issue.

Where jurisdiction of the person of defendant is necessary in order to issue an attachment, and it appears that such jurisdiction has not been obtained, the court must dismiss the attachment proceedings [68]

Under a statute providing that a person sued in a county other than that in which he has his domicile may file a plea of privilege to be sued in the county of his residence and that, if the plea is sustained, the cause shall not be dismissed but shall be transferred to the court having jurisdiction of defendant's person, after a plea of privilege has been filed and stands uncontroverted, the court does not have jurisdiction to issue a writ of attachment, notwithstanding a statute permitting the issuance of an attachment in a proper case at any time during the progess of the suit, since the requirement that the court must have jurisdiction is implied.[69]

§ 96. Nature of Jurisdiction on Transfer of Cause

Where an inferior court, although having jurisdiction of an attachment proceeding, is compelled to transfer the action to a higher court, the jurisdiction of the latter court is regarded as original.

If the writ of attachment is issued by an inferior court having jurisdiction, but by reason of the character of the levy, as where the levy is made on land, the proceedings must be transferred to a court of higher jurisdiction, the jurisdiction of the latter court is considered original.[70]

§ 97. Jurisdiction in Equity

In the absence of a statute granting such power, a court of equity does not have jurisdiction to entertain attachment proceedings.

As has been said in section 2 a (4), attachment is essentially a legal proceeding and it is unknown to the immemorial practice and usage of the courts of equity either in England or in the United States, being unavailable in equity in the absence of authority either of a statute or of the equity rules of the court.[71] Under some statutes, however, proceedings by attachment in suits in equity, or in suits of an equitable nature, as well as in actions at law, are authorized where the grounds of attachment exist.[72] Such jurisdiction depends on the Necessity of original jurisdiction

Where a statute provides, in a case where an order of attachment has been issued by a justice of the peace, and it appears by the return of the officer that defendant has no personal property in the county but is the owner of real estate situated in the county, that the justice shall certify his proceedings to the court of common pleas, where the action shall be proceeded with as if it had originated therein, except that in all actions under such section for any sum of which the justice of the peace has exclusive original jurisdiction, if defendant be a nonresident of the county, such fact shall be a ground of attachment in the court of common pleas, it was held that the legislature did not intend to make nonresidence of the county a ground of attachment in the common pleas court in those cases of which the justice of the peace did not have exclusive original jurisdiction—Barnard v. Anselm, 5 Ohio N P (N S.) 155.

statute,[73] and the statute will be strictly construed.[74]

If the demand is purely legal, a bill will not lie where the remedy by attachment at law is adequate,[75] and the doctrine that the court of equity should take jurisdiction in analogy to the proceeding at law can be applied only where the demand is equitable or there is some special ground for equitable interference.[76]

Procedure. Where attachment in equity suits is permissible under the statutes, the procedure therein must be in accord with that of the chancery court, and statutes regulating attachments at law do not apply.[77]

Retention of jurisdiction for complete relief. If the court obtains jurisdiction for the purpose of issuing the attachment, it will retain jurisdiction for all purposes.[78]

§ 98. Venue

a. In general
b. Nonresident defendant
c. Change of venue

a. In General

The proper venue for an attachment proceeding is ordinarily in the county in which a resident defendant resides, or under some statutes in the county wherein his property is located.

In order to give jurisdiction an attachment on the property of a resident must be issued where defendant, or one of the defendants, resides or may be found, or where he has property,[79] and a writ of attachment issued from the wrong county will be void,[80] although in some jurisdictions the general venue statute fixing the venue in county of defendant's residence does not apply to actions commenced by attachment.[81]

Where there is personal service or defendant is not a nonresident, the statutes fixing the venue of actions in the county of defendant's residence or where he may be found, or at the place where the contract is to be performed, are held to control, notwithstanding property subject to seizure may be situated elsewhere,[82] and the fact that property is attached in another county will not give the courts of the latter county jurisdiction, when defendant is served with process.[83] Under other statutes, however, the presence of property in a county furnishes sufficient basis for suing there without regard to the residence of defendant. If grounds for the attachment exist, the seizure of the property gives jurisdiction,[84] and an attachment suit, in a county in which the property of defendant in the possession of a third person is attached, is not removable to the county of defendant's residence, even though such defendant is a freeholder of the county of his residence.[85]

A writ cannot be sued out to attach property in a foreign county, beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the court, unless there is an attachment of property within the county where the suit is brought, or personal service on defendant within the county to give the court jurisdiction,[86] or un-

Property carried into county

Where plaintiff sued resident defendant in a county wherein defendant did not reside, plaintiff could not, in the absence of any express authorization to such effect, subject property of defendant to attachment in the county wherein the suit was brought, by hauling property of defendant into such county, under a hauling contract, merely for the purpose of laying venue in such county.—Johnson v. Fuqua, 148 So. 422, 25 Ala.App. 292, certiorari denied 148 So. 424, 227 Ala. 76.

Change of boundary after levy on land

After a court has obtained jurisdiction by an attachment of real estate within the county, a change of county lines, putting the attached property outside the county, does not defeat the jurisdiction.—Tyrell v. Rountree, (C.C.Tenn.) 24 F.Cas.No. 14,313, 1 McLean 95.

Authority restricted to particular county

Under a statute requiring the clerk "to issue a writ of attachment to be directed to the sheriff of his county," less where defendant, at the time suit is begun, is removing his property from the county and the officer may pursue it.[87] Where, however, jurisdiction over defendant has once been properly obtained, writs may issue against him to other counties where he has property, or against codefendants in the counties of their residence, or where they have property,[88] and the fact that the property in the county where the action is brought is subsequently exhausted in satisfying prior attachment liens does not invalidate the attachment in the other county.[89]

An attachment suit against joint defendants must be brought in the county wherein one of them resides;[90] and under a statute requiring an attachment to be issued in the county in which defendant resides, it is sufficient that one of joint defendants resided and was served in the jurisdiction of the court from which the attachment issued.[91]

Absconding debtor. Where a debtor absconds, it has been held that the proper place in which to bring attachment proceedings is in the county from which the debtor has removed, and in which he has his property,[92] or in the county through which the debtor is privately passing or wherein he is hiding at the time of its issue.[93]

b. Nonresident Defendant

Where the defendant is a nonresident, an attachment should generally be brought in a county in which he has property.

In the case of nonresident defendants, statutes very generally require attachment proceedings to be brought in any county in which the property of defendant may be found,[94] and in the absence of a permissive statute, a court of the county where a cause of action arises cannot issue an attachment writ where defendant is a nonresident and his only property in the state is situated in another county.[95] Under some statutes, however, where defendant is a nonresident, attachment proceedings may be brought in any county in the state and the writ may be served in any county in which he has property.[96]

Where one of two defendants resides in the county in which suit is brought, the court of that county can issue an attachment on the property in another county of the other nonresident defendant.[97]

c. Change of Venue

The parties to an attachment proceeding may consent to a change of venue.

By consent of the parties an attachment suit may be transferred from one county to another,[98] and such a change of venue carries the whole cause and every incident belonging to it to the court to which it is transferred.[99] Where, however, the proceedings are brought in the wrong county and the court has no jurisdiction, a change of venue to another county will confer no jurisdiction upon the court there,[1] and if the attachment issues before the action is transferred to the proper county it is void.[2]

§ 99. Objections and Waiver Thereof

Objection to jurisdictional defects or omissions in the proceedings may be raised at any time, but objections to mere irregularities therein must be raised at the proper time.

Where, through some fatal defect or omission in the proceedings, the court has not acquired jurisdiction, the objection may be raised at any stage of the cause,[3] or even collaterally.[4] On the other hand, where the defects are considered mere ir-

when certain prerequisites were complied with, a counterpart writ running into another county, issued by the clerk, is without authority and can give no jurisdiction of the person or property of defendant—Smith v Block, 7 Ark. 358

regularities, and the parties are before the court, they must raise the objection at the proper time and in appropriate form,[5] and the lien of the attachment cannot be displaced by showing such irregularities in the process as would have entitled defendant in the writ to abate it on plea.[6] Also, such an attachment cannot be attacked collaterally.[7]

A subsequent attaching creditor cannot object to the jurisdiction if the attachment defendant does not.[8]

Effect of irregularities in progress of action. After compliance with the preliminary steps which lead to the acquirement of jurisdiction by the actual seizure of the property, irregularities in the further progress of the cause will not render the judgment void.[9]

§ 100. Authority and Duty to Issue Writ

a. Authority to issue writ
b. Duty to issue writ

a. Authority to Issue Writ

(1) In general
(2) Issuance by officer other than one before whom returnable

(1) In General

The authority to issue an attachment must be found in the statute.

The authority to issue an attachment, like the jurisdiction of the court over such proceedings, must be found in the statute. Unless there is authority in the statute, there is no power to issue the writ, and such authority as the statute confers must be strictly pursued.[10] The officers usually designated by statute to issue the writ are judges,[11] justices of the peace,[12] and, as noted later in this section, clerks of the court. The statutes in some states also give authority to probate judges to issue a writ of attachment,[13] but in the absence of a statute granting such authority, the probate judge is without authority to issue a writ of attachment.[14]

Issuance by clerk of court. In the absence of statutory authority, a clerk of the court has no power to issue a writ of attachment;[15] where, however, the issuance of an attachment on proper application being made is a ministerial, rather than a judicial, act,[16] where permitted by statute, he may issue such a writ,[17] but only in the instances permitted by the statute.[18] Where the court is vested with jurisdiction over attachment proceedings, and the clerk of the court is the person designated by law to issue all process out of the court, it is held that the clerk is sufficiently vested with authority to issue writs of attachment;[19] but a mere broadening of the jurisdiction of an inferior court over attachments to the extent previously possessed by a court of superior jurisdiction will not confer upon the clerk of the lower court the

Statute valid

The provision in the organic act of Oklahoma conferring on the supreme court and district courts "chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction" does not give such courts exclusive jurisdiction to issue attachments, so as to render void an act of the legislature authorizing the probate judge to issue attachments, for the issuance of attachments under the Oklahoma statutes is a ministerial, and not a judicial, act.—Central L. & T. Co. v. Campbell Commn. Co., 19 S.Ct. 346, 173 U.S. 84, 43 L.Ed. 622, reversing 49 P. 48, 5 Okl. 396.

Duty ministerial

Debt due

Where the debt was due when the action was commenced, the clerk can make the order of attachment.—Scott v. Doneghy, 17 B.Mon.(Ky.) 321.

General and specific attachment

Under Code Civ.Pract. § 238, the clerk is not authorized to issue a specific attachment, although he may issue a general attachment. Specific attachments are regulated by § 251, and the order for a specific attachment may not be made by the clerk.—Samples v. Rogers, 107 S.W. 222, 32 Ky.L. 784.

19. Shillaber v. Waldo, 1 Hawaii 31.

powers which had previously been committed to the clerk of the higher court.[20]

(2) Issuance by Officer Other than One before Whom Returnable

Unless a statute so authorizes, a writ of attachment cannot be issued by an officer of one court returnable in another.

In the absence of statutory authority an officer of one court may not issue an attachment returnable to another court,[21] and a general grant of authority to issue the writ is not to be construed to enlarge the scope of the jurisdiction of the officer upon whom the power is conferred.[22] Under some statutes, however, the power to issue the writ of attachment is often conferred upon officers and judges other than those before whom the writ is made returnable,[23] and in such case it is immaterial that the officer issuing the writ would not have jurisdiction, in his judicial character, of the subject matter of the cause.[24]

b. Duty to Issue Writ

Where the issuance of an attachment on a proper application is purely a ministerial act, on a proper application the judge or officer is under a duty to issue the writ.

When the evidence which entitles one to an attachment is presented to the proper officer, and where the issuance of the writ under such circumstances is a ministerial, rather than a judicial, act, he is not concerned with the validity or justice of the cause of action, but should issue the writ without reference to such an inquiry.[25] Where the moving papers fairly call for the exercise of judgment on the part of the officer who is to grant the writ, the proceeding will not be void for want of jurisdiction, although the officer errs in his judgment on the weight of evidence.[26] The officer has no discretion when the affidavit which the statute prescribes is presented, but he must then issue the writ.[27] If there are several applications it is the duty of the officer to issue the writs in the order in which the applications on proper papers are presented to him.[28]

§ 101. —— Delegation of Authority

Under proper statutory authorization a deputy clerk may issue the writ for the clerk of the court.

Where the clerk of the court is authorized to issue writs of attachment, and under statutes authorizing the deputy clerk to perform the duties of the clerk, the writ may be issued for him by a deputy acting in the name of his principal.[29]

§ 102. —— Order for Attachment

a. In general
b. Form and sufficiency

a. In General

If an order is required by statute, it usually must be made before attachment can issue, but where the officer issuing the writ is also the one to make the order, he may in some jurisdictions issue the writ before making the order.

Where the statute contemplates or requires an application for a writ of attachment and an order of allowance by a judge, the making of the order is a judicial act,[30] and in such cases the clerk of the court cannot in the first instance allow the writ, but there must be an order granting it.[31] On the other hand, where not required by statute, an order

Chip attachment

Plaintiff need not secure the preliminary permission of the probate court, in order to make a chip attachment of the decedent's property.—Coldwell v. New England Trust Co., 181 N.E. 677, 282 Mass. 45

Specific attachment

An order for a specific attachment cannot be regarded as a general order of attachment where no grounds for either were alleged.—Ford v. Witty, 245 S.W. 846, 197 Ky. 86.

31. Kleine v. Nie, 11 S.W. 590, 88 Ky. 542, 11 Ky.L. 533—6 C.J. p. 100 note 60.

Clerical servant

A clerk of the superior court has no authority to issue an attachment sued out under the statute unless the judge, in granting the attachment, expressly so directs. Under a special order commanding the clerk to issue the writ, he may do so as the clerical servant of the judge, but in the absence of such an order he cannot, there being no provision of law authorizing him to issue writs of this kind.—Bates v. Shelton, 25 S.E. 16, 99 Ga. 164—6 C.J. p. 100 note 60 [f]

Equitable attachments

As an incident to its powers with respect to extraordinary process, a chancery court may issue attachments of property. These are sometimes called equitable attachments, and they cannot issue except on the fiat of a chancellor or judge. Where, however, the clerk is authorized to issue attachments, he may do so without a fiat.—New York Casualty Co. v. Lawson, 24 S.W.(2d) 881, 166 Tenn. 329 is not necessary to warrant the issuance of an attachment by the clerk.[32]

Where the judge issues as well as grants the writ, it is not necessary that he should spread on his docket the order allowing it.[33] Where the statute gives the clerk authority to make an order of attachment, according to some authority he may issue the writ directly without first granting an order on himself for its issue;[34] but it has also been held, where a registrar was given the authority to make an order and to issue an attachment, that an issue by the registrar, without an order on himself, is void.[35]

The jurisdiction by a commissioner, to order a writ of attachment on the proofs, must be formal and precise, and must appear in the order.[36]

Presumption as to regularity. Where a district judge allows an order of attachment on a debt not due, the presumption is, in the absence of a contrary showing, that it was made while the court was in session, and especially so, where the judge, at the time of the granting of the writ, was presiding at a regular term of the district court in which such action was brought.[37]

b. Form and Sufficiency

The order granting the attachment must be sufficient in form to meet the statutory requirements.

The order for attachment should be made and entered in the manner prescribed by statute,[38] and show on its face the statutory requisites.[39] It should be in writing,[40] but, under some statutes, it may be informal and in general terms.[41] An order for attachment directing it to issue for the amount claimed in the petition is sufficient without specifying such amount;[42] but, where the law fixes the amount of the bond, it need not be fixed in the order for attachment.[43] Where not required by statute the order need not recite the making of the necessary affidavit or the giving of the undertaking required by law, but it is better form for it to do so.[44] The order of a clerk granting a writ of attachment need not be under the seal of the court,[45] and, accordingly, the failure of a judge granting an order to attach thereto the seal of the court does not render the order void.[46]

Mere surplusage contained in the order may be disregarded, and its presence in the order does not invalidate it.[47]

§ 103. Disqualification of Officer

An officer who stands in any relation of interest to a party applying for an order of attachment may be disqualified from granting the attachment.

It is improper that an attachment should be granted by an officer who stands in any relation of interest to the party applying therefor,[48] and where the statute prohibits any judicial officer from acting in a cause in which he is pecuniarily interested, or where he has been the counsel for either party, such an officer, although he has authority to issue writs of attachment, cannot exercise such authority in such a cause.[49] Where, however, the clerk acts ministerially in the issue of a writ of attachment, he may issue the writ in an action in his own behalf.[50] Where a statute prohibited sheriffs from making or filing up any process and provided that all such acts done by them should be void, it was held that an attachment and levy on land was defeated as to persons not parties to the action who claimed by an intermediate conveyance by the owner, where the original writ was drawn and issued by the deputy sheriff who served it.[51]

Form of order defective

An order for a writ of attachment stating merely that the writ of attachment issue out of the supreme court of the state of New Jersey, in the sum of one hundred thousand dollars to be awarded to the plaintiff, is insufficient, where it does not award the writ against the goods and lands, rights and credits, moneys and effects, of defendant, as required by statute.—Henry v Freeman, 145 A. 107, 7 N J Misc 263.

Omission in order immaterial

The fact that an order of attachment directed to a sheriff omits the words "in your county," required by statute, does not make the order fatally defective since the sheriff could only execute the writ in his own county.—Schultz v. B. AFFIDAVITS AND APPLICATION

§ 104. Necessity

a. In general
b. Verified pleading as substitute
c. New or additional affidavits

a. In General

Plaintiff who seeks an attachment is generally required to set forth his basis for an attachment in a proper affidavit or petition.

The statutes very generally require, as a basis for the issuance of a writ of attachment, an affidavit on behalf of plaintiff setting forth the basis of his claim to avail himself of this process. Where such a requirement exists, such an affidavit is essential,[53] constituting the jurisdictional basis of the proceeding,[58] and if there is no sufficient affidavit, the writ of attachment and all subsequent proceedings, orders, and judgments based thereon are absolutely void,[54] and subject to collateral attack.[55] In some instances, however, an attachment may issue without affidavit, either under a statute expressly dispensing with it in a particular case,[56] as, for example, where the action is brought by the state,[57] or under a statute authorizing an attachment without requiring an affidavit.[58] Also, where it is the levy of the attachment which gives the court jurisdiction over the property of a nonresident defendant, a failure to make the affidavit will not defeat its jurisdiction, where the writ of attachment has been issued and levied on defendant's property.[59]

The affidavit is a part of the record,[60] and it has been held that if no affidavit appears in the record no evidence is admissible to prove that one was made,[61] except, perhaps, in the case of loss or destruction.[62] The mere absence of an affidavit from the record, however, cannot be made the ground of an objection in a collateral proceeding, where it appears that there was in fact an affidavit.[63]

Separate petition. Under a statute providing that, if attachment is sought subsequent to the commencement of the principal action, "a separate petition must be filed," a separate petition is essential, an amendment to the petition in the original action being insufficient, and the word "must" in such statute cannot be construed as "may."[64]

b. Verified Pleading as Substitute

In some jurisdictions plaintiff may set forth his basis for an attachment in a properly verified complaint.

In some jurisdictions, if facts sufficient to justify the issuance of a writ of attachment are alleged

Affidavit or testimony
Under a statute providing that an attachment may be issued, on the petition of the creditor, supported by "affidavit, or testimony if he can control the same," if the affidavit is void as an affidavit verifying the petition, the judge may consider it as sufficient "testimony" in support of the allegations of the petition, and grant the attachment—Strother v. Facts not excusing affidavit
Where, by statute, it was provided that a judgment creditor beginning equitable proceedings after an execution returned of "no property found" may have an attachment without affidavit, it was held that the mere statement that execution was issued and returned with a "no property found," is not sufficient to allow the attachment without an affidavit—Maddox v. in a duly verified bill or petition, the writ may issue without a separate affidavit setting forth such facts.[65] In such a case the complaint must be duly verified, and if the facts are only set forth without verification, and there is no affidavit, an attachment cannot issue.[66]

c. New or Additional Affidavits

After a proper and sufficient affidavit has been filed, plaintiff is ordinarily not required to file a new or additional affidavit in order to obtain another or second attachment.

Under permissive statutes, where one sufficient affidavit is made and filed, it is not necessary to make or file new or additional affidavits, in order to issue writs to different counties,[67] or where a second attachment is rendered necessary because of failure to serve the summons within a prescribed time after the first was granted[68] or after it has been vacated,[69] or upon the revivor of an action by the personal representative of a plaintiff who died before service of the writ.[70] So, also, where several orders of attachment may be issued at the same time, or in succession, a single affidavit will be sufficient,[71] although it in no way affects the proceedings that a second unnecessary affidavit was presented or filed.[72] Where property has been seized under the original writ, and a second or alias writ is issued for the purpose of summoning defendants, under some statutes a new affidavit is not required,[73] and it has been held that the same affidavit may be read in support of applications by separate defendants for attachments against the same absconding debtor.[74] If the affidavit sets forth sufficient facts to authorize the issuance of the writ and of an order of publication both the writ and the order may be granted without the filing of another affidavit.[75]

Under some statutes an additional affidavit is required so as to enable the court to determine the amount for which the levy must be made,[76] but a failure to file this affidavit is a mere irregularity, affecting only the levy, and may be waived by a general appearance.[77]

§ 105. Accompanying Pleadings

If required by statute, a declaration or complaint must accompany the affidavit.

Where the statute requires that plaintiff shall file or present a complaint or declaration, or that it shall accompany the affidavit, noncompliance with the requirement is fatal,[78] but no declaration or complaint need be presented or filed in the absence of a requirement to that effect.[79] The complaint or declaration, where required or necessary, must be sufficient with respect to the statement of facts and allegations to justify the issuance of a writ of attachment, and it is sufficient if it does so.[80] Where, however, the statute does not require that

Separate petition mandatory

Where it is provided by statute that a separate petition "must" be filed in order to justify an attachment after the commencement of the action, such a provision is mandatory and necessary to the jurisdiction of the court, the word "must" as used in the statute not being equivalent to "may"—Andrew v. Complaint insufficient

Where the complaint was insufficient to support the action, the writ of attachment fell with the complaint—Syrett v Strickland, 261 P. 484, 86 Cal App 623

Exhibits annexed

Where exhibits annexed to, and incorporated in, the complaint furnished some allegation of fact as to the damage, the papers were not jurisdictionally defective, as against a motion to vacate warrant of attachment—Jones v Obcanska Zalozna V Karline, 212 N Y S 557, 126 Misc 806, affirmed 214 N Y.S. 860, 216 App Div. 704

Premature filing

A complaint in attachment before the maturity of the debt is insufficient, unless it shows on its face the reason for its premature filing—Johnson v. Muens, 137 P. 126, 76 Wash 526.

Tender of stock before trial

Where plaintiff suing to recover the purchase price paid for stock, on the theory of rescission for fraud, failed to show a tender of such stock before trial, his complaint did not state a cause of action sufficient to sustain an attachment—Fraser v. Copake Lake Pure Ice Corporation, 216 N Y S. 496, 127 Misc. 810.

a complaint stating a cause of action accompany the affidavit, where the affidavit and bond for attachment are sufficient, the fact that the petition is subject to general demurrer will not render the attachment void.[81]

In some jurisdictions an affidavit containing the requisites of both an affidavit and a complaint will dispense with the requirement of a separate complaint,[82] or the absence of a complaint under such circumstances will be regarded as a mere irregularity curable by amendment.[83]

§ 106. Who May Make

If an affidavit is required, it must be made by the person designated by statute. It usually, under the statutes, may be made by plaintiff or his agent.

In view of the fact that attachment is a statutory proceeding, the statute, of course, determines who may make the affidavit, if any be required. Generally, plaintiff may show the facts on which he bases his right to an attachment by his own affidavit, or by the affidavit of his agent, attorney in fact or at law, or of others having knowledge of the facts.[84] The propriety of an affidavit by an attorney in an attachment proceeding has been questioned, however,[85] and where the statute expressly requires the affidavit of plaintiff, no affidavit other than that of plaintiff will authorize the attachment.[86]

A usual statutory ground for allowing an affidavit by an attorney or agent is the absence,[87] or disability,[88] of the principal. Where plaintiffs' absence from the county was assigned as the reason for an affidavit by their attorney in an attachment proceeding, and it later appeared that one plaintiff was actually in the county, the attachment was void, even though the attorney believed that all the plaintiffs were absent from the county.[89]

While all plaintiffs in the principal action need not join in the attachment proceedings, under some statutes, each plaintiff who claims the benefit of the attachment must join in making the affidavit,[90] although under other statutes one of several plaintiffs is competent to make the affidavit in behalf of all.[91]

Subsequent ratification. Where the statute permitting an agent to make the affidavit contemplates the existence of the relationship of principal at the time the affidavit is filed, an affidavit filed by an unauthorized agent cannot sustain the attachment, even though it is subsequently ratified by plaintiff.[92]

§ 107. Who May Take

An affidavit for an attachment can only be taken before an officer designated by statute, or, in the absence of such designation, before an officer invested with the power of administering oaths.

If the statute does not prescribe the officer before whom the affidavit shall be sworn, it may be taken before any officer acting within his jurisdiction and invested with the power to administer oaths;[93] but if the statute expressly provides before whom it may or may not be verified it will be of no avail unless sworn to before the qualified officer.[94]

Where it was required by statute that "complainant or complainants, or some one of them," should make the necessary oath in a proceeding for an attachment, it was held that such statute would not be construed so as to exclude an affidavit by an agent of the parties, especially in view of the general statutory declaration that the "attachment law . . shall not be rigidly construed" —Flake v. (2) The clerk, however, may veri-

Where it appears that the affidavit was made in a county where the officer had jurisdiction to take oaths, it is sufficient, even though the caption states that it was made in another county.[95]

In the absence of a statute requiring it, the affidavit need not necessarily be taken before the officer issuing the writ.[96]

Under a statute providing that the officer before whom depositions are taken must not be a relative or attorney of either party or otherwise interested in the event of the action or proceeding, an affidavit in attachment cannot be made before a notary public who is the attorney for one of the parties in the action,[97] and the fact that on objection another attorney is substituted for him to represent plaintiff in the proceedings does not validate the affidavit.[98] Under such a statute, however, a clerk of such attorney, not otherwise interested, is not disqualified.[99] Where there is no statute disqualifying the attorney of an interested party from taking the affidavit in an attachment proceeding, although it may be improper for the attorney who is a notary to swear his client to such affidavit,[1] it is, nevertheless, not a nullity.[2]

De facto officer. An oath administered by a notary who has failed to comply with all the statutory requirements authorizing him to administer oaths is good against collateral attack, since it is the act of a de facto officer.[3]

Officers outside of jurisdiction. Unless the officer who may take the affidavit is expressly designated, and where the simple administration of an oath is all that is required, affidavits taken before nonresident commissioners of the state, or officers in other jurisdictions having general authority to administer oaths, will be sufficient.[4]

§ 108. Time and Place of Making

The affidavit on which the attachment is based must, ordinarily, be made at the time of, or prior to, the issuance of the writ.

The statutes generally require that the affidavit setting forth the facts and the grounds on which the attachment is sought shall be made prior to, or contemporaneously with, the issuance of the writ, and under such statutes an affidavit made subsequently to the issuance of the writ is ineffective.[5] A statute, however, requiring that, before writs of attachment are issued, plaintiff shall make an affidavit to be indorsed thereon or annexed thereto that he has a just claim against defendant, has been held to be intended to afford defendant some measure of protection from having his property encumbered at the instance of plaintiff whose claim may be groundless; and the purpose of the statute is fulfilled if the writ, when it is delivered to the officer for service, has indorsed thereon or annexed thereto the required affidavit, even though the date of the affidavit be subsequent to the date of the writ.[6] Also, under statutes providing in effect that, when any suit is instituted, plaintiff may forthwith sue out an attachment against the estate of a nonresident, it is held that the affidavit may fy an amendment to defective grounds of attachment where the original affidavit has been verified and the writ issued before a proper officer—Hensley v Minehan, 114 S.E. 647, 29 Ga.App. 251.

(3) Qualification of clerk to administer oath in other jurisdictions see 6 C.J. p. 107 note 20 [d]–[g], [i], [j].

Commercial notary

In Georgia, under the general law attachments issued on affidavits administered by commercial notaries are void. Under L.(1913) p. 145 §§ 27, 28, creating the municipal court of Atlanta, an exception to the general law is created, and under this statute commercial notaries are qualified to administer the oath of attachment affidavits, where the writ issues from that court. This statute applies also to attachments issued from the municipal court returnable to the superior court—E. J. Brach & Sons v. Oglesby Grocery Co., 127 S.E. 157, 33 Ga.App. 481.

Notary

Under a statute providing that the attachment affidavit should be made before a judge, clerk, or justice of the peace, a notary does not have power to administer the oath—Campbell v. Brady, 11 S.W.(2d) 687, 158 Tenn. 98.

Attorney's fee

Where a note was placed in the hands of an attorney who was a duly qualified notary public, and the note provided for ten per cent attorney's fees to be paid by the debtor, it was held that the attorney was not interested in the results of the suit to such an extent as to be disqualified to swear plaintiff, or his agent, to an affidavit for a writ of attachment, since the taking of the affidavit was a purely ministerial act.—Walden v. be made either before or after the filing of the bill,[7] before abatement of the suit by return of the officer,[8] or before rights have accrued in favor of third person.[9]

Where the acts in substance amount to a single transaction, it has been held that the fact that the affidavit is executed before the complaint is filed does not render the attachment void.[10]

§ 109. Operation and Effect of Affidavit in General

An affidavit in conformance to the requirements of the statute serves as the basis for the attachment.

An affidavit sufficient on its face has the effect of conferring jurisdiction on the court to issue a writ of attachment.[11]

Where the facts justifying an attachment are properly stated in the affidavit, it will operate as the basis for an attachment, even though the facts stated are not true, since the validity of an attachment does not depend on the truth of the facts stated in the affidavit, but on the fact that they are stated in compliance with the statute,[13] and that they are stated to be true.[13] Accordingly, it has been held that the truth of the matters contained in the affidavit for a writ of attachment cannot be controverted by a motion for new trial,[14] nor can they be controverted for the purpose of abating the writ,[15] even though the allegations in the affidavit are false.[16]

It has been held, where plaintiff based his writ for an attachment on the nonresidence of defendant, that plaintiff is bound by such ground alleged in his affidavit.[17]

§ 110. Collateral Attack on Affidavit

An affidavit sufficient to give jurisdiction is not open to a collateral attack, but an affidavit insufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the res may be so attacked.

Where an affidavit is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the res, the fact that irregularities, informalities, or clerical errors appear therein will not subject the affidavit or attachment to attack in a collateral proceeding.[18] Where, however, the affidavit does not substantially conform to the essential statutory requirements, and is insufficient to confer jurisdiction over the res upon the court, it is open to attack in a collateral proceeding.[19] In accordance with these rules, an affidavit

Falsity of allegations not established

An attachment is valid, where the falsity of the allegations in the procuring affidavit, that the affidavit sought and the action prosecuted were not to hinder or defraud defendant's creditors, was not established by controverting affidavits.—Market Operating Corporation v. In Arizona

(1) It is provided by statute that in the case of an attachment for a debt not due, the facts set forth in the affidavit for attachment may be traversed by defendant.—O'Malley Lumber Co. v. Martin, 43 P.(2d) 200, 203

(2) Since no provision is made allowing a traverse in the case of a debt due, no traverse of an affidavit may be made when the debt is due.—Olsen v. Mading, 45 P.(2d) 23—O'Malley Lumber Co. v. Martin, supra.

(3) The reason given for this distinction is that "when the debt is already due the case can and presumably will be promptly determined on its merits, and since the plaintiff in attachment must give bond to protect the defendant before the attachment is permitted, the probability is that no great and irremediable harm will be done to the latter by allowing the attachment to stand awaiting a determination of the case on its merits. On the other hand, the legislature may well have assumed that since, when the debt is not due, the case cannot proceed to final judgment until it becomes due, it might work a much greater injustice on a defendant to tie up his property for an indefinite period and so has permitted him the right to controvert the allegations in the affidavit, which alone authorize the attachment, and to try that issue out while awaiting the time when the main issue in the case can be determined."—O'Malley Lumber Co. v. Martin, supra.

Who may raise objections to defects in affidavit see infra § 141 d (1).

Omission to state that claim is just

A sale of land in attachment proceedings based on an affidavit which describes the debt and demand, but which fails to state that the claim is a "just" one, cannot be collaterally attacked where plaintiff annexed to his declaration an itemized account, sworn to as "true, just, and correct."—McElwee v. Steelman, (Tenn.Ch.App.) 38 S.W. 275.

19. Duxbury v. Dahle, 81 N.W. 198, 78 Minn. 427, 79 Am.S.R. 408.

Right to make collateral attack not waived

A jurisdictional defect in an affidavit to procure an attachment is not waived so as to preclude a collateral attack, by the failure of defendant to take an objection to the affidavit on that ground.—Murray v. Hankin, 30 Hun (N.Y.) 37, 3 N.Y.Civ.Proc. 342, 65 How.Pr. 511.

for attachment, which is good on its face, cannot be collaterally attacked,[20] except for fraud or collusion.[21] Accordingly, it has been held that an affidavit for attachment cannot be collaterally attacked because the affidavit lacks a venue,[22] or because it does not state the nature of the indebtedness;[23] but an affidavit which is defective because it omits to state the nature or cause of action, as required by statute, is substantially defective, and is subject to collateral attack.[24]

The authority of an agent to sign an affidavit to procure an attachment cannot be collaterally attacked after judgment.[25]

§ 111. Form and Requisites in General

The affidavit or application in an attachment proceeding must conform to the requirements of the statute

An affidavit for an attachment must be made in compliance with the forms and requisites prescribed by statute,[26] and the matters required by statute to be in the affidavit must substantially appear therein with the required particularity, or the court acquires no jurisdiction to issue the writ.[27] An affidavit, however, is sufficient if on its face it complies with the statutory requirements,[28] and if the facts and circumstances stated in the affidavit have a legal tendency to make out a good reason for issuing an attachment and fairly call on the judge or officer to whom it is presented to exercise his judgment on the weight of the evidence, the proceeding is not void for lack of jurisdiction, although the officer may have erred in his estimate as to the weight of the evidence.[29]

A statute providing that an attachment shall not be quashed or dismissed because of formal defects does not destroy other mandatory procedural requirements of the statute, and, accordingly, a failure to make a necessary person a party to an attachment petition will invalidate an attachment.[30]

Except where the affidavit stands as a pleading,[31] it is not to be construed by the rules applicable to pleadings, nor is the same particularity of statement required.[32] The affidavit should, however, be reasonably specific,[33] as it is intended to be a safeguard against abuse of the right of attachment and a protection to the debtor against the wrongful employment of that remedy,[34] and it should be so direct and unequivocal that perjury can be assigned for swearing to it falsely.[35]

Only the facts specified in the statute need be set forth,[36] and hence an affidavit conforming to the provisions of the statute describing what it shall state need not show the existence of conditions required by other provisions.[37]

An affidavit for an ancillary attachment must sufficiently refer to the suit in aid of which it is brought.[38]

Necessity for writing. Where the statute only requires that plaintiff take an oath, the oath may be taken orally before the proper officer, and a writing is not necessary.[39] Where, however, an affidavit is required by the statute, a written affidavit is necessary [40]

Rules of bail affidavits applicable. Affidavits in attachment proceedings are sometimes placed on the same footing as affidavits submitted in an order for bail, and are consequently regarded as being subject to the same rules.[41]

Surplusage in the affidavit will not vitiate it,[42] unless it substantially affects the conformity of the affidavit to the statutory requirements [43]

The formal requisites of an affidavit for attachment are the title, venue, signature, jurat, and authentication [44]

§ 112. Mode of Allegation

An affidavit for attachment must properly allege the facts prescribed by the statute.

To entitle plaintiff to an attachment the affidavit or affidavits presented or filed must allege all the material facts[45] and must contain any special allegation,[46] prescribed by statute, and such facts must be shown by legal evidence.[47] According to some authority, where the statute requires proof to be made, in an affidavit for attachment, of the existence of certain facts, it means competent evidence, which would be admissible in the trial of the case.[48] According to other authority, however, the court will not refuse an attachment merely because some of the evidence contained in the affidavits on which the attachment is sought might be excluded, if objected to on the trial, unless something further is shown [49]

The affidavit for attachment must be clear and explicit on all the material matters,[50] and it has been held that an affidavit practically stating the ultimate facts of the complaint without stating the evidentiary facts is insufficient.[51] Where the affidavit for attachment alleges merely a legal conclusion,[52] or supports the allegation by hearsay testimony,[53] and fails properly to set out the evidentiary facts, the affidavit is insufficient.

Letter in foreign language. Under a statute providing that affidavits and other papers must be in the English language, an affidavit for attachment which bases plaintiff's right to recovery on an untranslated letter in the French language is insufficient.[54]

§ 113. —— Statutory Language

In the absence of a statute prescribing the form of the affidavit, it need not be made in the exact statutory language, although, if the language used in the statute is sufficient to allege the necessary averments, it is sufficient if it does so.

Unless the statute requires the affidavit to be

A statement in an affidavit for a writ of attachment that an alleged agent of defendant, on direction of deponent, sent a telegram to defendant making an offer for land and advised that defendant, if he desired to accept the offer, wire his acceptance to deponent, was purely a conclusion as to what the telegram contained, and was incompetent as proof of a valid offer to purchase the premises, and would not support the awarding of a writ of attachment Likewise, a statement "that at 11:37 a m of the same day plaintiff received a telegram from said S accepting said offer," was only a conclusion of the affiant drawn from an assumption of facts, and, such facts not being set forth, the affidavit was insufficient to warrant the awarding of the writ—Jaudel v. made by a specified formula no particular language is necessary,[55] and, as a rule, it is sufficient in this respect if the affidavit either follows or substantially follows, by equivalent words, the language of the statute respecting the nature of the action, the requirement as to the statement of plaintiff's claim, the grounds on which the attachment is sought, and the like.[56] Mere technical defects, verbal inaccuracies, and immaterial departures from the words of the statute may be disregarded if the material requirements of the act are fulfilled; but, where language other than that of the statute is used, it should be unequivocally identical in meaning with the language of the statute,[57] and the omission of any word which the statute makes essential is fatal.[58]

Where the statute specifies several allegations, some of which must be contained in an affidavit to support an attachment, and some of which are inconsistent, an affidavit incorporating all of such allegations is insufficient.[59]

If perjury cannot be assigned on the affidavit, it will not be sufficient even though it is in the exact language of the statute.[60]

§ 114. —— Affidavit on Knowledge

a. In general
b. Means of knowledge

a. In General

Under a statute so requiring, matters within the knowledge of affiant must be stated positively and on knowledge.

As a general rule, where the ground on which the attachment is sought is of such a character as to admit of definite statements respecting its existence, the allegations relative thereto in the affidavit or verified complaint must set out such facts and circumstances as may be necessary to establish the ground relied on, positively and unequivocally, on knowledge, and not simply on belief, or on information and belief,[61] but if sufficient is shown to authorize the issue of an attachment, other statements on information and belief may be disregarded as immaterial.[62] Accordingly, it has been held that the fact that defendant is a nonresident,[63] that defendant has not sufficient property in the state,[64] that the amount demanded is actually due,[65] that the debt sued on is due,[66] or that defendant debtor intends to abscond from the state with intent to defraud his creditors,[67] must be stated positively, and not on information and belief, as must also the facts in a tort action in which an attachment is sought.[68] Also, plaintiff is required to state positively and on knowledge the sum of money he is entitled to recover,[69] but in some jurisdictions this rule has been relaxed on behalf of attorneys and agents, so as to permit them to swear to the same on information and belief.[70]

The verification as to the truth of the complaint or affidavit should clearly relate to all the necessary and material matters contained therein; and,

In Louisiana under the code of practice an agent is required to swear as to the amount of the claim set forth in the affidavit, from his own knowledge, and not from his mere belief as was formerly permissible—Hicks v. Duncan, 4 Mart.(N. S) 314.

accordingly, where it is clear that some matters are sworn to on knowledge, and other matters are sworn to on information and belief, and it is not clear whether necessary matters are sworn to on knowledge as required, the affidavit and verified complaint is insufficient.[71]

An affidavit which avers the facts as affiant's own personal knowledge does not prove such of the averments as relate to transactions with which affiant was not apparently connected.[72]

The knowledge required by law in affidavits on attachment is not necessarily based on the personal observation of affiant;[73] hence, if the instruments on which an attachment is based are in his possession, his assertion of knowledge of the facts which they evidence is not unfounded, but is such as is contemplated by the statute.[74]

Where the statements and allegations in a petition for an attachment are made positively, it has been held that it is sufficient, even though the pleader is acting on information and belief,[75] and where an attachment affidavit states that affiant believes the facts therein but swears to the affidavit as true, or where the affidavit states the facts directly and is sworn to on information and belief, the affidavit is sufficient.[76]

Actual knowledge of the facts set forth in the affidavit may sometimes be presumed, as where from the circumstances it appears that affiant has such knowledge, or the circumstances are such that knowledge can be inferred,[77] where the relation of affiant to the parties or to the transactions is such as to warrant an inference of personal knowledge,[78] or, in some states, in the absence of a statutory requirement that affiant shall state whether or not the averments of the affidavit are based on direct knowledge, or on information and belief.[79]

b. Means of Knowledge

Where the circumstances set forth in the affidavit do not necessarily show that affiant has a personal knowledge of the facts, generally, he should set forth his means of knowledge.

Where the nature of the case is not such as will necessarily import personal knowledge by affiant of the matters set forth in his affidavit for an attachment, according to some authority affiant must, if he assumes to speak of his own personal knowledge, disclose the means by which he acquired such knowledge,[80] but according to other authority, where affiant states matters on his own knowledge, he need not set forth the means by which it was acquired.[81]

Although an unqualified allegation of facts may give rise to an implication of personal knowledge[82] where affiant has the means of knowledge,[83] such a statement will not be sufficient, if it is apparent that affiant's relation to the parties or to the transaction is not such as to import personal knowledge or it appears affirmatively, or by fair inference, that the allegations therein could not have been and were not made on such knowledge.[84] Accordingly, where affiant sets forth no circumstances showing personal knowledge,[85] or where it is apparent from the affidavit that affiant is a stranger to the transaction whereof he speaks,[86] as where he is merely an assignee of the claim,[87] or a third person who is not necessarily familiar with the facts whereof he speaks,[88] and the means or source of affiant's

Allegation of nonresidence

An allegation of nonresidence, when made by a principal in the transaction, and not by his assignee, is presumed to be made on knowledge, and is sufficient proof of the fact, although standing alone, to sustain an attachment.—Geduld v Baltimore, etc, R Co., 127 N Y S. 317, 70 Misc. 495—6 C J. p 113 note 57 [b]

knowledge is not disclosed, the affidavit is insufficient; and this is true, notwithstanding such statements are made positively,[89] or apparently on the personal knowledge of affiant.[90]

Where the affidavit is made by an individual plaintiff or by an officer of a corporation on personal knowledge, and the affidavit indicates that affiant is necessarily familiar with the facts of his own knowledge, he need not give the sources of his information.[91]

§ 115. —— Affidavit on Information and Belief

a. In general
b. Source of information and ground of belief
c. Excusing nonproduction of best evidence

a. In General

Where the circumstances are such as not to permit actual knowledge, or where the statute does not require that affiant swear that the facts are to his knowledge, the affidavit may be on information and belief.

Where the circumstances are such that it is not practicable to obtain an affidavit based on positive knowledge, or where the statute does not require such an affidavit, attachment may be had on an affidavit based on information and belief.[92]

Where the statute prescribes the form in which the belief of affiant may be stated, there must be a substantial compliance with such form, or the affidavit will be insufficient.[93] Accordingly, where the statute requires that affiant state that he believes the grounds for an attachment exist, a statement that affiant is informed that such grounds exist is insufficient.[94]

The belief of affiant must be based on credible grounds. Accordingly, a mere belief in the truth of the facts charged as the basis for an attachment is not sufficient, but such belief must be founded on stated facts and circumstances within the knowledge of the attaching party which are sufficient to induce such belief in the mind of a person of ordinary prudence, judgment, and foresight.[95] Similarly, the source of the information must be reliable, and must be supported by sufficient and competent evidence,[96] and where affiant obtained his information from a third person, it must appear that affiant's informer had knowledge of the facts which he communicated.[97]

Where the source of information is an affidavit made in a legal proceeding, it has been held not to be necessary that an affidavit on information and belief should state that affiant believes the information.[98]

An agent or attorney is sometimes permitted to swear positively to the indebtedness without disclosing a knowledge of the facts on which he bases his allegations,[99] but, where the affidavit by an agent or attorney, after positively alleging the amount of an indebtedness, proceeds to disclose the source of such information, and it appears that such information is insufficient, the affidavit is deficient in this respect.[1]

Grounds of the attachment may be shown to be on the belief of affiant, but the statement of facts relied on to show the existence of the grounds, on which the application for the attachment is based, must be positive and on the knowledge of affiant, and not on information.—Littlestown Sav Inst. v. Bream, 121 S.E 169, 95 W.Va. 351.

Statement on information not hearsay
Where plaintiff stated that he was informed that certain goods sold for a particular price, the statement that plaintiff was "informed" was held not to indicate that plaintiff made such statement on hearsay, but rather showed that plaintiff was informed on his subject.—L B. Facts in affidavit "ascertained"
Affidavit in attachment proceeding, containing evidence in support of allegations of complaint and stating that such facts were "ascertained" in the course of bankruptcy proceedings, will not sustain writ of attachment.—Hart v. Page Mfg Co., 175 N.Y S. 502, 187 App.Div. 296.

Sufficient to support judgment
The evidence required to support an attachment must be the same as that necessary to support a judgment or decision of the court on trial of an action, except that secondary or hearsay evidence is sometimes allowable; but such evidence will be allowed only when primary evidence cannot be secured, and the judge may determine whether the information has been competently derived and has such probative force as to justify issuance of warrant.—Hart v. b. Source of Information and Ground of Belief

(1) In general

(2) As to intent

(1) In General

Where the affidavit is made on information and belief, affiant is generally required to state the source of, and grounds for, his information and belief.

In an affidavit on information and belief it must, as a general rule, appear that affiant's information was derived from a competent source, that is, the sources of information together with the grounds of the belief must be disclosed in such a manner as to enable the court to decide on the probable truth of the statements and the authenticity of the jurisdictional facts;[2] but the circumstances may excuse affiant from disclosing his source of information.[3] Affiant is required to state the source of his information, notwithstanding the facts in the affidavit are positively stated, where it is clear that such statements are not predicated on personal knowledge,[4] or where it is clear that affiant could not know such matters positively,[5] but where a fact, concerning which affiant could have positive knowledge, is directly and positively alleged, he is not required to give the source of his knowledge.[6]

The names of third persons from whom the alleged information is derived should be given,[7] or their affidavits should be presented;[8] and, where information is derived from books or papers they should be produced, if practicable, or, if not, copies or extracts should be furnished with appropriate reference thereto.[9]

An affidavit for attachment, made on information and belief derived from a written admission of defendant in affiant's possession, is sufficient,[10] as is also an affidavit based on information transmitted by telephone, where it appears that affiant recognized the voice of his informer, or otherwise knew his identity[11]

(2) As to Intent

Where an allegation is made in an affidavit for attachment concerning the existence or nature of defendant's intent, the facts on which such belief is based must be set forth in the affidavit.

Intent to depart, to remove, or to dispose of property, or to defraud creditors, is not usually the subject of direct or positive proof, but is to be inferred from the acts and conduct of the debtor, and in order to authorize such an inference there must be appropriate allegation of such facts, circumstances, acts, or declarations as will enable the court or officer to judge whether or not such an intent may be implied,[12] and, if the allegations

Letters from defendant insufficient

An averment in an affidavit stating, "The defendant is not a resident of this state, but resides in the state of Michigan at Provemont, Mich, as I am informed and verily believe. The sources of my information and the grounds of my belief are communications in writing had with the said defendant at Provemont, Mich, which communications, including letters received from the said defendant at Provemont, Mich, are in my possession" does not give a basis for finding that defendant is a resident of Provemont, Mich—Severn v. Affidavits insufficient

(1) Where the ground on which attachment was originally issued was that defendant was about to assign, dispose of, and secrete its property to defraud creditors, and neither in the original affidavit, on which attachment was issued, nor in the supplemental affidavit, used on hearing, did plaintiff set out the grounds on which its belief was based, to enable the court to pass on their sufficiency, such affidavits were insufficient to sustain attachment—First Nat Bank v. Tarboro Cotton Factory, 104 S E. 129, 180 N C 128, denying rehearing 102 S E. 195, 179 N C 203.

(2) Affidavit in attachment, alleging "deponent is informed and believes [defendant] is about to remove himself and property [from the state] . . . with intent to defraud his creditors . . . that defendant has assigned and disposed of . . . his personal property with like intent, that deponent derived the information that the defendant is about to remove [from the state], and the information that he has sold and is about to sell certain of his property as aforesaid, from the defendant himself," is insufficient, where no facts are alleged to show the fraudulent intent, and no source of information is stated as to such intent—J H Witherspoon Co. v Bell, 128 S E. 503, 132 S.C. 303.

are as consistent with an honest purpose as with a dishonest intent, an attachment should not be granted on mere conjecture.[13]

c. Excusing Nonproduction of Best Evidence

Satisfactory reasons should be given for not producing the best evidence of grounds of information and belief, where affiant does not produce such evidence.

If the affidavit of the informant or other source of information is not produced, satisfactory reasons should be given for the failure so to do.[14] However, if the inability to procure the testimony of the informant,[15] or, although not so stated in terms, the impracticability of producing his affidavit[16] fairly appears from the moving papers, a sufficient excuse is presented; but mere inconvenience in procuring the affidavits of persons from whom the information was obtained,[17] or lack of time to procure such affidavits,[18] is not a sufficient excuse.

§ 116. —— Reference to Pleadings or Papers

Reference may sometimes properly be made in an affidavit for attachment to papers or pleadings already on file, which relate to the attachment proceeding.

Copies of, or extracts from, the pleadings, affidavits, or depositions on file may properly be considered where the applicant is unable to procure the affidavits of the persons who made the originals,[19] and in support of the affidavits presented on the application the court may consider affidavits made or filed by other parties at the same time in similar proceedings against the same debtor.[20] However, a mere reference to another affidavit on file without setting out extracts therefrom bearing on the facts relied on is insufficient,[21] as is also a reference to affidavits without annexing a copy thereof or stating them to be on file,[22] or a mere reference to, without a copy of, a general assignment and inventory made by the debtor which are filed in another court.[23]

Where permissible under the statute, where the affidavit refers to the complaint, it may properly be deemed a part of the affidavit, and it will be sufficient to show the ground on which the action is brought, or to show the grounds of attachment,[24] particularly where the complaint is also verified.[25] On the other hand, where the affidavit makes no reference to the complaint or petition, it is no part of the affidavit,[26] and where the statute requires the affidavit to show that a cause of action exists against defendant, specifying the amount of the claim and the grounds thereof, a failure to show such matters in the affidavit is not supplied by reference to an annexed complaint which is not duly verified.[27] If the affidavit lacks precision in stating plaintiff's demand, it will be sufficient if the allegations of the complaint in this connection, which are sufficiently made, are incorporated in or annexed to the affidavit or are referred to expressly or by fair implication.[28]

An affidavit to the effect that the allegations in the petition which is defective are true cannot be aided by a subsequent amendment to the petition.[29]

§ 117. Specific Requisites, Statements, and Allegations

a. In general
b. Affidavits made by agents

a. In General

The affidavit must contain all the statements and allegations which are essential under the statute.

Since attachment is a statutory remedy, in order to invoke jurisdiction to issue the writ, the affidavit, if required by statute, must contain all the essential allegations, and must show all matters required by the statute, the specific requisites, statements, and allegations required will be discussed hereinafter in this section and the sections immediately following.

The affidavits of different creditors filing under an attachment proceeding need not be based on the same cause of attachment.[30]

Indebtedness or cause of action arising within state. If the attachment cannot issue unless the cause of action arose within the state,[31] or the county,[32] the omission of an allegation to that effect is fatal. Where, to authorize the attachment, it should appear that defendant was indebted within the state, that fact may be shown by alleging that the contract was made within the state or that the creditors were residents thereof.[33]

b. Affidavits Made by Agents

Although, in the absence of a statute so requiring, where the affidavit is made by a person other than plaintiff, his authority to make the affidavit, that it is made on behalf of plaintiff, and his reason for making the affidavit need not be shown, under a statute requiring the affidavit to contain such matters, they are essential.

Where required by statute, when a person other than plaintiff makes the affidavit, his authority to make it should appear expressly,[34] or by recitals showing the capacity in which affiant acts.[35] On the other hand, while parties suing out an attachment writ may not do less, but need not do more, than the statute requires, and, in the absence of any implied necessity from the statute that affiant's authority should appear, a statement thereof is unnecessary.[36]

Where the statute requires that the affidavit be made by plaintiff, or by some one in his behalf, if the affidavit is not made by plaintiff, an averment that it is made on his behalf is essential,[37] and the fact that the affidavit was made on plaintiff's behalf should appear on the face of the affidavit.[38] In the absence of such a statutory requirement, however, the affidavit need not state that it is made on plaintiff's behalf.[39]

Although in the absence of a statute so requiring such a statement is not necessary,[40] under some statutes the reason why the affidavit is not made by plaintiff, if it is made by another, should be set forth in the affidavit.[41] Accordingly, where it is made by another by reason of plaintiff's absence, such absence must be shown.[42] Under a general statute providing that when an oath of a party is required, it may, in case of the absence of such party, be made by his agent or attorney, it has been held that an agent in making an attachment affidavit need not recite therein that plaintiff was absent from the jurisdiction, as such fact may be otherwise shown.[43]

§ 118. —— Venue

The affidavit should show the venue of the officer before whom it was taken.

For the purpose of showing that the oath was administered in the jurisdiction of the officer before whom the affidavit was taken, the venue or place of the taking should appear,[44] but it has been held that, if it appears that the oath was administered by an officer of a designated county, the absence of a formal statement of the venue is immaterial.[45] The fact that the venue is omitted

Agency sufficiently shown

An affidavit will be regarded as containing a sworn statement that affiant is the agent of the creditor therein named when the affidavit is made in the following language. "State of Georgia, Richmond County Personally appeared before me, the undersigned justice of the peace in and for said county, H C Bryson He is agent for Geo S. Lombard, who, being duly sworn, on oath says that A. F Green is justly indebted to Geo S Lombard"—Greene v Lombard, 126 S E 890, 33 Ga App 518 from the affidavit will not render it void where the notary's seal is affixed, showing that the affidavit was taken within his jurisdiction [46]

In aid of the affidavit it will be presumed to have been sworn to in the county designated in the venue,[47] that the officer had jurisdiction to administer the oath within the county stated,[48] and that, although the county and state are not definitely set out, the oath was administered within the proper county.[49]

§ 119. —— Entitling

An affidavit for an attachment should show the title of the cause and specify the court wherein the action is pending, although a failure to so entitle the affidavit may not be fatal where these facts appear elsewhere.

The general rule is that the affidavit should contain in its caption the title of the cause and should designate the court where the action is pending.[50] An omission to entitle the affidavit is, however, of no importance, if the court in which the remedy is sought sufficiently appears elsewhere,[51] or the body of the affidavit sufficiently designates the parties.[52] Indeed, the want of the formality of a title is of no consequence where the affidavit is attached to the writ, since the title is for the purpose of identifying the suit in which the affidavit is designed to be used [53]

On the other hand, some courts take a stricter view on the necessity for entitling, and where it is impossible to separate the heading from the body of the affidavit, it has been held insufficient [54]

Under a statute providing that an affidavit, without the title of the action or proceeding in which it is made or with a defective title, is as valid and effectual for any purpose as if duly entitled, if it intelligibly refer to such action or proceeding, an affidavit is sufficient, although not entitled at all, if it makes intelligent reference to the action.[55]

A mere clerical error in the name of the court is immaterial.[56]

Cause not commenced. An affidavit should not be entitled in a cause which is not pending at the time the affidavit is made, since no perjury can be assigned thereon [57]

§ 120. —— Identification and Description of Parties

a. In general
b. Plaintiff
c. Defendant

a. In General

The affidavit for attachment must generally show which of the parties is the plaintiff and which is the defendant.

The affidavit should show which of the parties named is plaintiff and which defendant;[58] but their identity or relation to each other may be sufficiently shown by a reference to the caption,[59] or by resort to the record or other papers.[60] The omission of affiant's name from the body of the affidavit has been held immaterial where he subscribed it [61]

b. Plaintiff

(1) In general
(2) Residence

(1) In General

The affidavit for attachment should identify the plaintiff.

The affidavit should identify plaintiff,[62] but if plaintiff is sufficiently identified from other papers

Entitling defective

An entitling in an affidavit is defective where it describes an action as being of the October term, when in fact it is of the preceding April term, and as being sworn to in the June term—Quarles v. Robinson, 2 Pinn (Wis) 97, 1 Chandl 29

56. Bernard v. McClanahan, 79 S E. 1059, 115 Va. 453.

Error not fatal

That an affidavit was written on a printed form containing the name "Corporation Court," instead of "Court of Law and Chancery," at the top of the paper did not invalidate the affidavit, where such mistake was not repeated elsewhere in the paper, and the clerk certified that the affidavit was filed in the court of law and chancery—Bernard v. McClanahan, 79 S E. 1059, 115 Va. 453.

62. Burnside v. Davis, 31 N W. 619, 65 Mich. 74—6 C J. p 119 note 6.

Citizenship of plaintiff

(1) Where the fact that plaintiff was a citizen of the state was necessary to be shown to entitle him to an attachment, failure of the affidavit to contain a sufficient allegation of that fact has been held to render it defective.—Boarman v. Patterson, 1 Gill (Md) 372—Mandeville v. Jarrett, 6 Harr. & J.(Md.) 497—Shivers v.

in the action the fact that he is not named in the affidavit,[63] or that it contains no direct allegation that affiant is the plaintiff, or one of them,[64] is not a fatal defect.

(2) Residence

Under the prevailing statutes, the affidavit usually does not have to show the plaintiff's residence.

Where a nonresident as well as a resident plaintiff is entitled to sue out an attachment, it is not necessary that the affidavit should contain any averment as to the residence of plaintiff,[65] and even though the law allows only residents to obtain attachments, it has been considered not necessary that the residence of plaintiff should appear in the affidavit, but sufficient if that fact is shown in any part of the proceedings.[66] Where, however, an affidavit can be made by an agent only where plaintiff is absent from or resides out of the state, such nonresidence or absence must appear in an affidavit by an agent.[67]

c. Defendant

(1) In general
(2) Citizenship and residence
(3) Defendant an adult

(1) In General

The affidavit for attachment should identify the defendant.

The affidavit should identify or describe defendant,[68] but extreme particularity is not required,[69] and the fact that plaintiff's pleading varies from the affidavit in naming or describing the debtors is immaterial where it is apparent that the same parties are intended.[70] Where his name appears in the caption it is not necessary that the defendant should be named in the body of the affidavit.[71]

The fact that two of the persons named as defendants in the caption are not connected with the transaction out of which the claim arose does not furnish a ground for disturbing the attachment.[72]

(2) Citizenship and Residence

Where the statute so requires, the affidavit for attachment must allege the citizenship and residence of the defendant.

If the statute requires that the citizenship of defendant shall be alleged, the absence of such an averment is a fatal defect;[73] but if an allegation of defendant's residence is not a prescribed part of the affidavit, it is unnecessary,[74] even though the statute prescribes that a debtor must be sued in the county of his residence.[75] Where, however, defendant's nonresidence is a prerequisite to the issuance of a writ of attachment, such fact must sufficiently appear;[76] and where an attachment may issue for a debt not due only in the county where the debtor resides, last resided, or where his property may be found, the affidavit must state his residence, last residence, or the location of the property.[77] An affidavit for attachment which alleges that defendant is a nonresident need not, where the statute does not prescribe it, state the place of defendant's residence if such fact is known, or that the place of his residence is unknown, where such is the fact.[78]

(2) This allegation seems no longer to be necessary in the jurisdictions in which it was formerly required—Birch v. One of several defendants

Where an affidavit of attachment, in an action against three defendants, stated that it was not sought to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors of "said defendant," it was held to be irregular and defective—Peterson v. Beggs, 148 P. 541, 26 Cal.App. 760

69. Belcher-Stine Lumber Co v. Burns, 123 N.W. 1123, 159 Mich. 466—6 C.J. p 120 note 18.

Initials of defendant

(1) A designation of defendant in an affidavit for an attachment is sufficient even though he is sued by his initials instead of by his full christian and middle names, where it appears that defendant has been in the habit of using his initials in business transactions, and has been commonly designated by his initials, and was known by his initials to plaintiff in his dealings with him, and it was clearly apparent who was meant.—Kinsey Co v. Heimerdinger, 13 Ohio Cir.Ct.(N.S.) 195—Daniels v. Taylor, 13 Ohio Cir.Ct.(N.S.) 116.

(2) In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, an affidavit in which an initial instead of the christian name of defendant is used, is insufficient—McGrew v. Steiner, 71 A. 1122, 77 N.J.Law 377

(3) Defendant an Adult

The affidavit need not expressly state that the defendant is an adult.

Even though the statute in effect prohibits the issue of an attachment against the property of a minor, it seems that the affidavit need not specifically state that defendant is an adult;[79] but that it will be sufficient if that fact appears by implication,[80] and even where such an allegation was considered necessary, the court has permitted supplemental proof.[81]

§ 121. —— Nature or Cause of Action or Demand

The affidavit for attachment must set forth the nature or cause of action or demand with the particularity required by statute.

Where required by statute, the cause of action or nature of the claim should be definitely stated in the affidavit, for the reason, among others, that it may appear that the action is one of those specified as a case in which an attachment may be granted,[82] but in the absence of a statute requiring that the cause of action or nature of the claim be stated in the affidavit, a failure to make such a statement in the affidavit is not fatal.[83] While such facts should be alleged as will enable the court or officer to judge of the existence of a cause of action on which the issuance of an attachment will be warranted,[84] and, while ordinarily a statement

Civil action for recovery of money

Where a showing that a particular action was a civil action for the recovery of money was necessary, in order to entitle plaintiff to an attachment, and the affidavit stated that "plaintiff has commenced said action against said defendant for the recovery of $322 00, that the defendant is indebted to said plaintiff in said sum, that said sum is just and due and is wholly unpaid," it was held that such affidavit sufficiently showed that the nature of the action was a civil one, and that it was brought for the recovery of money—Millus v Lowrey Bros, 164 P 668, 63 Okl. 261, L R A 1918B 336

Reference to decree

Statements in an affidavit for attachment, referring to a decree as showing the amount due, did not warrant a presumption that plaintiff had a personal decree against defendant on which execution could issue and that therefore attachment would not lie—Deitz v. Whyte, 109 S E 212, 131 Va. 19

Statements of nature of claim held sufficient.—Cartmell v The Rudolph Wurlitzer Co, 5 Ohio N P (N S) 604—Preston County Power Co v. Franklin Coal & Coke Co, 114 S E 873, 92 W Va 308—Norman v. Willis, 106 S E 252, 88 W.Va. 76.

Liquidated damages

In the absence of a showing that the damages charged to be due in the affidavit are unliquidated, the affidavit is sufficient in this respect.—Robinson v. Mellon, 126 A. 863, 2 N J Misc 1184

Statement of statutory ground

Where the statute does not require the affidavit to state a cause of action, a statement of one or more of the grounds of attachment enumerated in the statute is sufficient—Hemmi v. Grover, 120 N W. 561, 18 N D. 578.

6 C J p 123 note 40.

Action on note

(1) An attachment affidavit in a suit against an indorser of a note, must allege presentation at time and place appointed and within the proper hours, demand of payment, and due notice of indorser, and if payable at a bank the affidavit should, pursuant to Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, allege presentation at the bank during business hours before close of bank in the event contemplated by statute, it not being sufficient merely to allege due protest—Deming Nat Bank v. Baker, 98 S.E. 438, 83 W.Va. 429.

(2) Other requisites of allegation on note see 6 C J. p 121 note 38 [f].

Action upon guaranty

Where an action against a nonresident upon an alleged written guaranty was begun by attachment, and the affidavit did not set forth the evidentiary facts showing defendant's liability upon the guaranty, the affidavit was insufficient—Friedman v. Prescetti, 192 N.Y.S. 55, 199 App.Div. 385

Conversion

As regards the issuance of a warrant of attachment against a foreign corporation to which two shovel cranes had been shipped, in a suit for conversion of the cranes, affidavits in support of attachment which fail to set forth any evidence supporting the allegations of the complaint charging conversion of cranes are fatally defective—Miller Bros Const Co v. Thew Shovel Co, 288 N Y S. 944.

Employment

(1) Where plaintiff brought action to recover a fee for services in adjusting an income tax claim against defendants' deceased ancestor, but failed to allege that plaintiff was employed by defendants to perform services for them or for decedent's estate, plaintiff did not make out a cause of action and was not entitled to an attachment—Price v. Foster, 161 So 161, 182 La 79

(2) Also, an attorney suing for the reasonable value of services must set forth in his affidavit on which attachment is based the facts showing employment, services, and value thereof, and evidence proving damages—Shapiro v Loft, Inc., 254 N.Y. S. 197, 142 Misc 144.

Facts not showing agency

An affidavit for a writ of attachment setting forth that a certain person "was authorized" by defendant to solicit offers for the sale of certain lands and premises was insufficient to prove the relation of principal and agent between such person which would suffice in a pleading setting up the cause of action is sufficient,[85] extreme particularity in the statement of the existence and nature of plaintiff's cause of action is not required;[86] and generally it may be said that the requirement will be satisfied by any language from which conformity to the statute may be gathered.[87]

Under a statute requiring plaintiff in his affidavit to state the nature of his claim, the affidavit need not descend to details, but is sufficient if it shows a valid cause of action and defendant's liability thereon.[88] Under such statutes, or similar statutes having the effect of requiring plaintiff to set forth in his affidavit the essential evidentiary facts upon which he relies, it is sufficient if the affidavit states a prima facie case,[89] or facts from which the right to attachment may be inferred,[90] or contains evidence from which the court can determine that a necessary ultimate fact can be substantiated.[91]

Under statutes having the effect of requiring plaintiff to show a right to attachment in his affidavit, where an attachment is sought in a cause of action arising from contract, the affidavit should set forth facts showing its existence,[92] and defendant's liability on the contract,[93] that plaintiff duly performed,[94] or that he is willing to perform,[95] and that defendant failed to perform his part of the contract.[96] Where plaintiff must, in his attachment papers, show the evidentiary facts by which he seeks to establish the cause of action, if he relies upon a written contract, the writing should be a part of the attachment papers, a mere state-and defendant without further explanation, although it would have been sufficient had affiant stated that he had obtained the information from defendant, nor did a statement that the alleged agent, on the direction of deponent, sent a telegram to defendant making an offer for the land and advised that defendant, if he desired to accept it, wire his acceptance to deponent, prove agency—Jaudel v. Schoelske, 112 A. 328, 95 N.J.Law 171.

It is enough if the owner is substantially advised as to the matters set forth in said section providing for the affidavit."—Weirick v. Mansfield Lumber Co., 117 N.E. 362, 365, 96 Ohio St. 336.
Particularity required in affidavit generally see supra § 111.

Auction sale
An affidavit for an attachment need not allege all the facts with respect to how an auction sale was conducted, especially where it is not claimed it was not properly conducted.—Crook v. Lupton, 170 N.Y.S. 845, 182 App.Div. 858.

In West Virginia, however, under Code (1913) c. 106 § 1 (§ 4455) it is held that plaintiff in stating the nature of his claim should state it with as much particularity, though not in detail, as is required in the declaration or bill, so that it may thereby be made to appear that he has a valid cause of action against defendant.—Deming Nat. Contract not stated
A petition in an action against a nonresident, in which an attachment is sought, alleging that plaintiff is entitled to the payment to her of one-half of the proceeds of a life insurance policy, and that defendant collected and appropriated to her own use the portion of said sum coming to plaintiff, does not state an express or implied contract between plaintiff and defendant.—Ross v. Poor, 12 Ohio App. 496.

Torts
The Michigan statute (3 Comp.L. [1915] § 13049) relating to actions for tort, and providing that plaintiff shall set forth in his affidavit in detail his cause of action, applies only to tort actions, and not to actions in assumpsit on implied contract.—Albee v. Liability and breach of contract Affidavit in foreign attachment for breach of contract of sale of yarn, based on a written order, must state the acceptance of the order either in writing or by parol and the facts constituting the breach of the contract, and also when the goods should have been delivered, and the market price at such time.—Mindlin v. Saxony Spinning Co., 104 A. 598, 261 Pa. 354.

Allegation sufficient

ment of its contents being insufficient,[97] although a copy may be sufficient.[98] If, however, the statute does not require that the attachment papers include a copy of the contract, or the contract itself, it is not essential to jurisdiction, and may subsequently be supplied.[99]

Where it need not appear in the affidavit whether the contract is express or implied, a statement in the affidavit that the money is due upon an implied contract, when in fact it is due upon an express contract, does not make the affidavit defective, since, if it states that it is a contract for the direct payment of money, it is sufficient, and anything stated further may be disregarded as surplusage.[1]

Where an attachment is sought in a cause of action arising from the negligent acts of defendant, the facts constituting such negligence must be set out.[2]

Cause not pleaded Where the declaration or petition is filed with the affidavit, attachment cannot issue on a cause of action contained in the affidavit but not pleaded in the accompanying pleadings.[3]

§ 122. —— Ownership of Claim

If required by statute, the affidavit for attachment must show that the plaintiff owns, or is entitled to recover, upon his demand.

If required by statute, it should also appear from the affidavit that plaintiff is a creditor of defendant and that he is entitled as such to recover the claim or demand for which the action is brought,[4] but where there were several plaintiffs, an affidavit by one of them stating that he ought to recover has been held not fatally defective because asserting an indebtedness to him personally.[5] Where an affidavit charges an indebtedness with the agent and not with the real plaintiff, the affidavit is insufficient.[6] An affidavit by plaintiff stating that he is now the owner and holder of the demand sued on under an assignment by the assignee to whom the original holder had transferred it, together with an affidavit by such original holder stating that he informed defendant that the claim had been duly assigned to plaintiff, is sufficient to show the assignee plaintiff's ownership of the claim.[7]

§ 123. —— Identification of Cause

Where required by statute the affidavit must identify the principal action.

If the statute requires that the affidavit shall identify the action in which the auxiliary remedy is sought, the affidavit must so describe it as to show unmistakably that it is an adjunct of that particular proceeding;[8] but an affidavit which has this effect is sufficient,[9] although it fails to use

Excerpts sufficient

Where objection was raised to an affidavit of attachment because it failed to annex complete copies of the various letters upon which the cause of action was based, but merely set forth the excerpts from such letters, it was held that even though it was possible that the omitted portions of such letters contained something which would contradict or qualify those parts of the letters, which were set forth, yet such possibility was not sufficient to require the entire letters to be set forth—Salembier, Levin & Co. v. North Adams Mfg. Co, 178 N Y.S. 607.

Acts of negligence

(1) Where the principal action was in tort for negligence in driving an automobile at a speed in violation of statute, where neither attachment nor supporting affidavit alleged that defendant's automobile was traveling in excess of the speed permitted by statute, at time of collision, attachment levied thereon was invalid—Keller v. Federal Bob Brannon Truck Co, 269 S W. 914, 151 Tenn. 427

(2) Where the affidavit for attachment merely averred that an automobile was being driven in violation of law at a speed rendered dangerous by the circumstances, without detailing the circumstances, it did not state a cause of action—Woodworth v. Skeen, 150 S E 764, 158 S.C. 362.

Plaintiff and defendants entitled to recover

In an action by one joint adventurer to recover money due to him and his associates, in which the associates refused to join and were made defendants in compliance with the statutory requirements, the fact that plaintiff in his complaint and affidavit for attachment stated that plaintiff and certain named defendants, his associates, were justly entitled to recover from the other defendant, instead of alleging that plaintiff alone was entitled to recover, did not render the affidavit and petition insufficient for an attachment—Friede v. Azovsko Donskoi Kommercheske Bank, (D C.N.Y.) 266 F 131.

Use and legal plaintiff

Where there was an attachment in the name of a party, as treasurer, for the use of a church, and it nowhere appeared that the real plaintiff had the same rights as were possessed by the use plaintiff, the affidavit was insufficient—Green v. Abdill, 6 Pa Co. 666.

technical language,[10] to refer specifically to the petition,[11] or to give the number of the case.[12]

§ 124. —— Showing Pendency of Action

Where the statute so requires, the affidavit must state the commencement or pendency of the action to which the attachment is auxiliary.

In the absence of a statute so requiring, a specific showing in the affidavit that the action has actually been commenced[13] or that the summons has been issued or served,[14] is not essential. If the statute requires the commencement or pendency of the action to be alleged, any statement substantially showing its institution or subsequent prosecution will be sufficient;[15] and where the statute requires that the affidavit together with the bond and attachment shall be returned to the court in which the suit was originally commenced, and filed with the papers in the original case, it is not necessary to allege the existence of a suit.[16]

§ 125. —— Showing as to Claim or Indebtedness

a. In general
b. Facts and particulars of indebtedness
c. Maturity of the debt
d. Justice of claim
e. Credits, offsets, and counterclaims

a. In General

An affidavit for attachment should ordinarily state the fact that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff, and should also set out the amount of such indebtedness.

Although in the absence of a statute so requiring, the affidavit need not state the damages sought,[17] where required by statute, as it usually is, the affidavit or petition in an attachment proceeding must state that defendant is indebted to plaintiff,[18] and it must also contain a precise or reasonably certain statement of the amount of the indebtedness claimed.[19]

11. White Day Furniture Co. v. Dallas First State Bank, (Tex.Civ.App.) 114 S.W. 1159.

Affidavit sufficient

An affidavit for attachment, which is appropriately styled and numbered with the style and number of the case and states that it is made at the instance of plaintiff and is filed among the papers in the suit, sufficiently identifies the suit, and the fact that the petition is not referred to in express words or made a part of the affidavit will not vitiate the attachment proceedings.—White Day Furniture Co. v. Dallas First State Bank, (Tex.Civ.App.) 114 S.W. 1159.

6 C.J. p. 125 note 55.

"Actual"

Where the statute provides that a writ of attachment shall issue whenever plaintiff "shall make an affidavit showing that the sum for which the attachment is asked is an actual, bona fide, existing debt," the omission of the word "actual" in the affidavit is not fatal if the allegations and facts stated in the affidavit show that it is an "actual," bona fide, existing debt, without repeating the exact words of the statute.—Miller v. Alaska-Canadian Oil & Coal Co., 4 Alaska 439.

"Indebtedness" including liability for damages

In a statute requiring the affidavit for an attachment to specify the amount of indebtedness, "indebtedness" includes liability for damages from breach of written contract.—State v. Superior Court for King County, 159 P. 1193, 93 Wash. 98.

"Owes"

Where an affidavit for an attachment stated that defendant "owes" plaintiff a specified sum, it was held such affidavit sufficiently complied with a statutory requirement that such affidavit should aver that the debtor owed plaintiff.—Dicks-David Co. v. Edward Maurer Co., (D.C.N.J.) 279 F. 231

6 C.J. p. 126 note 56.

Approximate damage

While the proof of cause and damage need not be as direct and positive in affidavits for attachment as is required on the trial, there must be something more than an assertion of "approximate damage" to justify the warrant.—Parker v. Robert Wallace & Co., of Belfast, 201 N.Y.S. 416, 206 App.Div. 465.

Sum sought instead of sum due

The fact that a surety, in an affidavit for an attachment, stated the sum she sought to recover instead of the sum defendant should pay as required by statute, was immaterial, where the amount of the note was specifically stated and it was obvious that such was the amount defendant should pay.—Lincoln Bank & Trust Co. v. Arnold, 75 S.W.(2d) 751, 256 Ky. 80.

Omission of word "amount"

An affidavit for an attachment filed in a suit in equity against a real debtor and others who are merely formal defendants is not vitiated on the ground that it omits the word "amount," where it uses the words, "that in said suit the plaintiffs, as affiant verily believes, are justly entitled to recover, at the least, against the defendant [naming the debtor], the said sum" demanded, specifying the amount thereof.—Hale v. Grow, 106 S.E. 409, 88 W.Va. 173.

Under such statutes a general averment of damage is insufficient and the indebtedness or amount claimed should be specifically stated;[20] but the amount claimed need not be stated with absolute accuracy,[21] and accordingly it has been held that the omission to state the amount of interest will not render the affidavit defective.[22] Also, in the absence of a statute so requiring, plaintiff need not state in his affidavit or petition data by which a mathematical computation can be made of the amount of the demand.[23] A slight variance between the amount claimed and the actual indebtedness, caused by miscalculation or inadvertence, will be disregarded, where it is evident that plaintiff has acted in good faith. A fortiori, it is not a ground of objection that the affidavit shows plaintiff to be entitled to a larger sum than he demands.[24] The sum stated must not, however, be merely conjectural, for in such case no attachment would lie.[25]

Affidavit on behalf of joint parties. One joint plaintiff may state that no counterclaims exist to the knowledge of all the plaintiffs,[26] for in such a case it will be presumed that matters positively sworn to were within the personal knowledge of affiant, unless it is apparent that he could not have such knowledge.[27]

Joint indebtedness. An allegation that two defendants named are indebted to plaintiffs,[28] or that defendants are copartners,[29] sufficiently alleges a joint indebtedness. Where it is sought to attach the property of one joint debtor the affidavit need not state a joint indebtedness or take notice of the other,[30] and if the property of one joint debtor may be attached, an affidavit alleging the indebtedness of both is sufficient to authorize a judgment against one.[31]

Mere surplusage in the allegations of claim or indebtedness, if the statement is otherwise sufficient and not rendered uncertain thereby, is immaterial.[32]

Reference to petition. Where reference may be made to the petition, in accordance with the rules already discussed in § 116, a reference in the affidavit to the petition may be sufficient where the amount of the claim is required to be, and is, set forth in the petition.[33]

b. Facts and Particulars of Indebtedness

(1) In general
(2) Where demand unliquidated

(1) In General

Where the statute so requires, the affidavit for attachment must set forth the facts and particulars out of which the indebtedness arose.

Where the statute so requires, the particulars of the debt should be given, or facts should be stated, which will satisfy the officer of the existence of the indebtedness claimed,[34] although in

Lump sum including unliquidated amount

Where the affidavit for attachment included in the lump sum stated, unliquidated damages, the affidavit was defective because it did not state the amount of defendant's indebtedness —Ewer v. Jackson, 283 P. 110, 102 Cal App. 793—Doud v Jackson, 283 P. 107, 102 Cal App. 213

Prima facie showing sufficient

Where affidavits made a prima facie showing sufficient to sustain an attachment in full, a motion to reduce the amount thereof was properly denied, since the accuracy of defendant's computations should await trial.—N V. Tonerde Maatschappij Voor Montaan-Chemie v. Great Lakes Coal & Coke Co., 276 N.Y.S. 895, 243 App Div 640.

Reference to interest

An affidavit which alleges a specific indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff in a principal sum, is not rendered uncertain by a reference to the amount of interest that should be added, computed at a specified rate upon certain daily balances.—State v Pondera Valley State Bank, 248 P. 207, 77 Mont. 1.

Where an affidavit stated that defendant owed plaintiff three hundred seventy five dollars, the fact that such affidavit further added "in addition to certain claims for damages for breach of contract hereinafter referred to" did not render the amount uncertain, since such latter statement could be regarded as mere surplusage.—Hamilton v. Baker-Hansen Mfg Co., 169 P 238, 176 Cal 569

the absence of such a statute the ultimate fact only need be stated, and not the probative facts out of which the indebtedness arose.[35]

In some states the affidavit must allege that the contract sued on has not been secured by mortgage or otherwise, if such is the case.[36]

(2) Where Demand Unliquidated

Where so required by statute, in an action for unliquidated damages, the affidavit should state facts sufficient to enable the court to judge of the probable amount of damages due.

Where the statute expressly or impliedly so requires, in an action to recover unliquidated damages, special facts and circumstances should be set out, so as to enable the court to judge of the probable amount of damages sustained and recoverable, and to determine the amount for which the levy may be made.[37] And where there is merely a statement of the conclusion of damages without evidence establishing substantial damages, the affidavit is insufficient.[38] It has also been held that an affidavit which adopts a certain measure of damages as the amount of recovery must state the evidence relied on to establish such recovery.[39] Where the amount of damages sought is the difference between the contract price and the market price, it has been held that the affidavit must set forth the market price at the time the breach of contract occurred.[40]

Affidavit sufficient

(1) An affidavit for attachment, stating that the indebtedness arose upon express contracts for the direct payment of money, that the contracts were promissory notes for definite amounts, that the said sums are an actual, bona fide, existing debt due and owing from defendants to plaintiff, is sufficient—McMaster v Ruby, 157 P. 732, 80 Or 476.

(2) A statement that a claim in which an attachment is sought, is for "board, washing, and lodging," is sufficient as against a motion to discharge an attachment, but the facts from which such claim arose must be stated with greater particularity in a bill of particulars—Parkinson v Crawford, 13 Ohio N P.(N S) 73.

Affidavit insufficient

(1) Where plaintiff, an attorney, brought action to recover for the reasonable value of his services, and he generally stated in his affidavit that such services were furnished from 1931–1933, and that he defended actions and performed various other legal services for defendant it was held the affidavit did not state with sufficient particularity the facts out of which defendant's alleged indebtedness arose—Wesley v Drake, 269 N Y S 174, 240 App Div. 59.

(2) A statement in his affidavit for an attachment by plaintiff, that he lent a sum aggregating seven thousand three hundred forty-one dollars to defendant, and that defendant promised to repay such amount upon demand, and that upon demand, defendant refused to repay such amount, is not a sufficient statement of the nature and particulars of the debt or demand and will not support an attachment—Stenberg v Poole, 152 A 703, 9 N J Misc 111.

(3) A mere averment that plaintiff is entitled to recover a sum of money for the value of goods sold and delivered to defendant, in the absence of any averment that plaintiff sold and delivered such goods, and in the absence of any statement as to the price agreed upon is insufficient to support an attachment—Swift v. Martini, 162 N Y S 136.

Items specified

Where an affidavit for an attachment stated that the action was one for money due on a contract, and contained in addition a specification of the items of the account sued on, the affidavit was sufficient to support the attachment—Flannigan v. Monongahela Tie & Lumber Co, (W Va.) 87 S E 165

Right to attachment on a nonliquidated demand see supra § 14

Affidavits held sufficient

(1) In an action for breach of a contract to deliver sulphuric acid and of warranty of quality, allegations in the affidavits for attachment, that defendant failed to deliver a specified number of tons, that the market value was eighty dollars per ton, that plaintiffs were damaged in the amount of seventy-nine thousand seven hundred sixty five dollars and thirty five cents, that the contract price was thirty-one dollars per ton, that the contract percentage of acid was ninety-seven and one half, that the acid delivered was of lower percentage, and only of the value of twenty dollars per ton, and that the difference in the value of the contract and actual quality was sixty dollars per ton, sufficiently shows evidentiary facts as to damages sustained to support the attachment.—Stiner v. Tennessee Copper Co, 161 N.Y S. 986, 176 App Div. 209

(2) Other affidavits held sufficient.—6 C J. p 129 note 71 [b].

Affidavits held insufficient

(1) A warrant of attachment for damages in inducing plaintiff by misrepresentations to purchase stock must be supported by at least prima facie evidence of the damages demanded, and the mere allegation that the stock has not been sold on the stock markets and that plaintiff was unable to find a person willing to purchase, is insufficient.—Reinhardt v Horace L Day Co, 213 N Y S 130, 126 Misc 367

(2) Other affidavits held insufficient—6 C J p 129 note 71 [a].

Time of proving grounds

The appropriate time to prove the facts alleged in the attachment papers as grounds of attachment in an action for unliquidated damages for fraud and deceit was at the time of applying for the writ of attachment—Sicklick v Schasseur, 225 N.Y.S 279, 231 App.Div 742.

is sufficient to state the amount of damages claimed,[41] and where the claim is for injuries to property, it is not necessary for the affidavit to state the value of the property, but only the amount of the damages.[42]

c. Maturity of the Debt

(1) In general
(2) Where debt sued on not matured
(3) Setting forth both matured and immatured debts

(1) In General

If the statute so requires, plaintiff must state in his affidavit for attachment that the debt has matured.

If under the statute attachment issues only where there is a present indebtedness, as already considered in § 15, and, where the statute so requires, the affidavit must affirmatively show that the debt upon which the action is brought is actually due at the time the action was commenced, or the affidavit made,[43] and a failure to make such a statement is fatal.[44] It is, however, not necessary that the maturity of the debt shall be stated in express terms,[45] and the requirement is satisfied by a statement that defendant is indebted,[46] or that the sum claimed is justly due;[47] although it has also been held that a statement that defendant is "indebted" is not equivalent to a statement that defendant's debt is due at the time the affidavit is made.[48] It has been held that the statement of a cause of action in the petition, showing the right to immediate compensation, will control a statement in the affidavit that the debt has not matured.[49] If the debt, although treated as due, has not actually matured, it may be shown that it was agreed that it should become due on the happening of a certain contingency, and that the contemplated contingency has occurred[50]

(2) Where Debt Sued on Not Matured

Where an attachment is sought for a debt which has not yet matured, the affidavit must allege the facts required by the statute in regard to the claim or indebtedness.

Where plaintiff may secure an attachment upon a debt which is not due and payable, as already discussed in § 15, if the statute so requires he must state the fact in his affidavit that the debt is not due, and a failure to do so is fatal.[51] Where the statute so requires, he must also state in his affidavit the time of the debt's maturity.[52] In the absence of a requirement in the statute, however, that the affidavit state that the debt is not due, such a statement is not necessary, since the court has no right to prescribe additional requirements to be complied with in order that a party may avail himself of this process.[53] Accordingly, under such a statute, where the instrument sued on shows on its face that it has not matured, it is not necessary that the affidavit should allege the immaturity of the debt.[54]

In accordance with the rules already discussed in subdivision b (1) of this section, if required by the statute the affidavit must also set up the existence of the particular ground or grounds upon which an attachment to secure this class of debts may issue,[55] and must set up facts or allege reasons for the immediate issue of the writ sufficient to satisfy the officer to whom application is made of the propriety of allowing it to issue.[56]

(3) Setting Forth Both Matured and Immatured Debts

Where permitted by statute, an affidavit setting forth both matured and immatured debts is not fatally defective

Under a permissive statute, an affidavit setting forth both matured and immatured debts is not

Allegation held sufficient

An attachment affidavit, alleging that the debt is an "actually existing debt and . . . now due" is the equivalent of the required allegation that the debt "is actually due"—Rosen v. Levy, 148 So. 393, 109 Fla. 523

In Georgia, under Civ. Code (1910) § 5084, an attachment for purchase money cannot issue until the debt is due, and, where the affidavit for the attachment does not so allege, the attachment is subject to dismissal. The rule is otherwise in attachments based upon other grounds.—Hensley v. Minehan, 114 S.E. 647, 29 Ga.App. 251

defective for that reason,[57] or for the reason that it discloses that a part of the demand is not yet due;[58] but under some statutes it is necessary that the affidavit show how much of the debt is due and how much is not due.[59]

If the affidavit is sufficient as to one claim and defective as to the other, it may be sustained as to the former and disregarded as to the latter,[60] or the insufficient allegations may be regarded as surplusage.[61]

d. Justice of Claim

Where required by statute, plaintiff's affidavit should state that his claim is just.

The omission of the affidavit to conform to a statutory requirement that it shall state that plaintiff's claim "is just,"[62] that defendant "is justly indebted" to plaintiff,[63] or that affiant believes that plaintiff is justly entitled to recover[64] will render it insufficient. On the other hand, the exact language of the statute need not be employed, and an implication of the justice of the demand necessarily arising from the language employed is sufficient,[65] especially where the substance of the necessary allegation appears by the duly verified declaration in the action.[66] According to some authority, where the affidavit must state that the claim is just, the express statement is essential, and it is insufficient to merely state facts showing that the claim is in fact just.[67] According to other authority, if the indebtedness of defendant is clearly and positively stated and sworn to, it is sufficient.[68]

e. Credits, Offsets, and Counterclaims

If the statute so requires, the affidavit must allege, either in the statutory words or their equivalent, that the claim is due over and above all counterclaims and set-offs.

Where the statute requires the affidavit to show that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in an amount specified, or that the latter is entitled to recover such an amount, over and above all legal payments, set-offs, or counterclaims, compliance with this requirement is essential to confer jurisdiction to issue the writ,[69] but the absence of the counterclaim need not necessarily be stated in the language of

Omission in verified petition
Where an attachment may issue upon a properly verified petition, the failure to state in the petition that the claim is just, will render the petition defective—United Collieries v. Martin, 60 S W (2d) 125, 248 Ky 803, 89 A L R 808, 89 A L R 971.

"Justly entitled to recover"
"The statute uses both the words 'justly' and 'recover,' and it is not enough to say that the plaintiff is entitled to recover The word 'justly' is designed to more deeply search the conscience, and guard against flimsy, unjust demands, by compelling the sworn conscience to explicitly state that the demand is just It performs a material office, and is indispensable . The affidavit says that the affiant believes that plaintiff 'should' recover, instead of 'entitled' to recover Are 'should' and 'entitled' tantamount? The word 'entitled' means that the party has legal ground to recover, while 'should' may mean merely the expression of the affiant's opinion I do not think this will do under the rigid doctrines relating to attachments—Sommers v Allen, 28 S E 787, 788, 44 W Va 120

67. In Kentucky, where it is provided by statute that plaintiff must, in his affidavit for an attachment, show that his claim is just, it has been held that the affidavit must expressly state that the claim is just, and a mere statement of facts showing that the claim is just is not sufficient, notwithstanding the fact that the statute does not require that plaintiff state his claim is just but requires only that he show his claim is just—Frick & Lindsay Co v. 69. Anderson v. Malley, 131 N Y S 739, 191 App Div. 573—6 C J. p 132 notes 2, 3
Affidavit held sufficient.—Rickerson v Bunker, 56 N Y S 202, 26 Misc. 383—6 C J p 133 note 7 [b]
Argumentative allegation insufficient
An affidavit for warrant of attachment, which stated plaintiff "is entitled to recover the sum of $6,000, with interest, over and above all counterclaims known to him inasmuch as set forth in the foregoing paragraphs, the defendants owe him $6,000 as commission," etc, "and none of the defendants has claimed to have any counterclaim," is defective, since the statute requires such statement to be made positively, on the knowledge of plaintiff, and not the statute,[70] and a bare statement by plaintiff that the amount is due over and above all counterclaims is sufficient, without the addition of a statement as to the knowledge of the nonexistence of counterclaims.[71] If there are no counterclaims, plaintiff should state that fact, or if there are counterclaims existing, the affidavit should state them, and then the amount due over them, if any, would be apparent. A mere statement of a legal conclusion in the language of the statute that there is a sum due plaintiff over and above all counterclaims known to plaintiff is insufficient.[72]

An affidavit which alleges that defendant is indebted in a certain amount "over and above all discounts" has been held not equivalent to an allegation that defendant is indebted "over all payments and set-offs"[73] Where the action is brought upon several distinct claims the affidavit need not state the nonexistence of counterclaims as to each item.[74]

Where plaintiff is required to allege in his affidavit that the amount claimed is due over and above all counterclaims known to plaintiff, such a requirement means that the sum claimed is due above all counterclaims plaintiff thinks just, and the fact that defendant has interposed a counterclaim in another action between the parties does not require the attachment to be vacated because of the falsity of the allegation[75]

In some jurisdictions it is sufficient to specify the amount of the indebtedness, over and above all legal set-offs, "as near as may be," either in the language of the statute,[76] or by expressions substantially equivalent,[77] but the use of other words which introduces an element of uncertainty in the affidavit is insufficient.[78]

An uncertain allegation as to the amount of an offset existing in defendant's favor may be excused where it is due to inability to specify the exact amount.[79]

Action by assignee of claim With respect to assignees of claims, who are themselves plaintiffs, it is sufficient, under the statutes under consideration, for them to state the nonexistence of counterclaims as to their knowledge, and it is not necessary to make any statements as to the existence of counterclaims against their assignors.[80] On the other hand it is not sufficient to show that at the time of the assignment the amount was due and owing to the assignor over and above all counterclaims, since the fact that the sum is due and owing over any counterclaim against plaintiff must also be shown[81]

Affidavit by person other than plaintiff. Where the affidavit is made by a person other than plaintiff, a mere statement that the amount is due over and above all counterclaims known to deponent is wholly insufficient,[82] unless it appears from the affidavit that the affiant had charge of the transactions out of which the cause of action arose, and is so conversant with plaintiff's affairs that his knowledge is as full as plaintiff's.[83] Where the affidavit is made by an agent or attorney, he should set forth such facts in his affidavit as will enable the court to see how he knew or could have known that plaintiff was entitled to the debt over and above all discounts and set-offs,[84] but if affiant establishes that he is possessed of sufficient knowledge on the argumentatively—Anderson v. Malley, 181 N.Y.S. 729, 191 App.Div. 573

Known to defendant

Under a statute providing that an attachment affidavit must show that plaintiff is entitled to recover a sum stated therein over and above all counterclaims known to plaintiff, an affidavit stating that deponent is justly entitled to recover a sum from defendant over and above all counterclaims "known to defendant" is fatally defective—Reynolds v. Bean, 138 N.Y.S. 1101

"On the following facts"

Papers for attachment, alleging that defendant is indebted to plaintiff in a certain sum for damages for the breach of a contract, which amount is now owing and due from defendant over and above all counterclaims, known to plaintiff "on the following facts," are not open to the objection of containing no particular allegation that the sum claimed to be due is over and above all counterclaims, the words "on the following facts" referring, not to the counterclaims known by plaintiff, but to plaintiff's right to recover damages, claim to which is based on the facts thereinafter set forth—Crook v. subject, his statement as to the nonexistence of counterclaim will be sufficient.[85]

Where the affidavit is made by an agent of plaintiff, who acted for him in the transaction and knows all the facts, and who states positively and without qualification that the amount claimed is due over and above all offsets and counterclaims, it is not defective because of a failure to state that the facts with respect to counterclaims are known to plaintiff.[86]

§ 126. —— Showing Grounds of Attachment

a. In general
b Allegation of more than one ground
c. Allegations as to particular grounds

a. In General

If required by statute, the affidavit for attachment must show the existence of the grounds authorizing the issuance of the writ.

A compliance with a statute requiring that plaintiff make an affidavit alleging or showing one or more of the statutory grounds for attachment is essential,[87] although an immaterial omission in stating the grounds of attachment is not fatal.[88]

A statement of a single ground is sufficient without including in the affidavit any averments as to other grounds on which the writ might issue,[89] and in the absence of a statute to the contrary, although the petition may state facts authorizing an attachment, plaintiff is not confined to the ground so disclosed, but may, in his affidavit, rely on other statutory grounds.[90]

Probative facts. Under some of the statutes an affidavit setting forth the existence of the grounds of attachment in the words of the statute is sufficient without any further statements of facts showing the existence of such grounds;[91] but under other statutes it is necessary that the affidavit should show facts and circumstances tending to establish the existence of the grounds relied on.[92]

Exhaustion of legal remedies. Under a statute authorizing the enforcement of a foreign judgment against a nonresident by a bill in equity, where the creditor has exhausted his legal remedies, it must appear that he has resorted to and exhausted such remedies against the debtor in the state of their common residence.[93]

Refusal to pay or secure debt. Under a statute permitting an attachment on the ground that defendant has property which he refuses to give either in payment or security for the debt it is not necessary for the affidavit to state the place where the demand for payment or security was made,[94] or an intent to defraud creditors.[95]

b. Allegation of More than One Ground

(1) In general
(2) Disjunctive allegations

(1) In General

The affidavit for an attachment may allege more than one ground for an attachment

Although the contrary has been held,[96] plaintiff may generally allege as many distinct and separate grounds for the attachment within the terms of the statute as he may deem expedient,[97] provided the grounds relied on are consistent with each other.[98]

Statements consistent

(1) An attachment affidavit charging that defendant "has assigned, secreted, or disposed of his property and is about to further do so with the intent to delay and defraud" his creditors is not defective as charging two inconsistent grounds therefor —Clarke & Simmons v. Rule, 185 N W. 947, 151 Minn 30

(2) Where an affidavit alleged that defendants had "secreted, incumbered, transferred, or otherwise disposed of and are about to secrete, incumber, transfer, or otherwise dispose of their property with intent to defraud or delay their creditors," and "have removed and are about to remove some of their property from the state with intent to defraud or delay their creditors, and that the debt upon which this action is founded was incurred for property obtained under false pretenses," the allegation is not inconsistent.—People's State Bank v. Karlen, 182 N W 531, 532, 44 S D 82.

(3) The statements, "First. That the said defendant is about to secrete his property for the purpose

In such case, however, the grounds should be set forth cumulatively or conjunctively.[99]

If one of several grounds relied on is properly alleged, the affidavit is sufficient to warrant the issuance of the attachment, although the statement as to other grounds is defective.[1] Accordingly, an attachment is not subject to general demurrer where it contains one valid ground, although it contains an invalid ground.[2] So also the attachment will be upheld if plaintiff sustains one of the grounds alleged,[3] or if defendant leaves one of such grounds uncontested.[4]

(2) Disjunctive Allegations

The affidavit should not allege disjunctively two or more grounds for attachment which are separate and distinct and which are in no sense a phase of the same general act.

In stating two or more grounds care must be taken to avoid inconsistency or contradiction which would introduce an element of uncertainty and indefiniteness and render it impossible to determine which ground is relied on,[5] and consequently, if two or more separate and distinct grounds which are in no sense a phase of the same general act, are alleged in the alternative, the affidavit is useless for any purpose,[6] although either of such grounds would have been sufficient for the attachment had they been stated singly or united by the conjunction "and."[7] The fact that one of several grounds alleged in the alternative is insufficiently stated will not save the affidavit.[8]

Two or more phases of the same fact, or different facts of the same nature, which constitute but a single ground for attachment, may be stated disjunctively.[9] So an affidavit is not fatally defective because it states in the alternative different of defrauding his creditors, and Second. That defendant is about to remove his property or a part thereof out of Young County, where suit is brought, with intent to defraud his creditors, and Third That defendant is about to convert his property or a part thereof, into money for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of his creditors," are not incompatible or inconsistent with each other—Alvey v Smith, (Tex Civ App) 28 S. W.(2d) 267, 268.

(4) A declaration in an affidavit for attachment that defendant is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors is not inconsistent with a declaration that the debt due plaintiffs was for property obtained under false pretenses—Butler v Nail, (Tex Civ App) 36 S W. (2d) 307, affirmed Nail v Compton, (Com.App) 55 S W (2d) 1028

Statement inconsistent

(1) Where plaintiff in his affidavit for an attachment alleged that defendant had disposed of all of her property and was about to dispose of the remainder, the grounds asserted were self contradictory and the affidavit was insufficient—Schavrien v. Reich, 155 N Y.S 365

Lack of security for claim

Where an affidavit for an attachment stated that the payment of the claim sued upon had not been secured, or if secured, that such security had become valueless, since two distinct grounds were stated in the alternative, such affidavit could not support an attachment—Heaton v. Panhandle Smelting Co, 179 P. 510, 32 Idaho 146—Patch v. Stewart, 253 P 254, 78 Mont. 192, followed in Bancroft v. Leverty, 254 P. 1118, 78 Mont 559—6 C J. p 136 note 41 [a] (1), p 146 note 34 [b]

Nonresidence, disposition of property, or removal from state

An affidavit which alleges that the defendant is a nonresident, or that he is about to dispose of his property with the purpose of defrauding his creditors, or that he is about to remove from the state is defective because alleging the grounds for an attachment in the alternative—Pierce v Boyle, 218 N W. 756, 242 Mich 149—6 C J p 136 note 41 [a] (2).

Grounds united by conjunctive

An affidavit which alleges that defendant "has assigned, secreted, or disposed of his property and is about to assign, secrete and dispose of other property" is not defective, but if defendant had stated such grounds in the alternative the affidavit would have been defective because alleging inconsistent grounds for attachment. —First State Bank of New Germany v Hultgren, 245 N W. 829, 830, 187 Minn 502

Removal or absconding as one act

(1) An affidavit for attachment, stating the the debtor had removed modes of effecting a stated purpose or intent,[10] especially where in so doing it follows the language of the statute;[11] nor is it a fatal defect that the affidavit states that defendant intends to commit or has consummated an act which furnishes a ground of attachment;[12] but it has also been held that an affidavit for attachment which alleges that defendant has disposed, or is about to dispose, of his property, states two distinct acts, and is in consequence defective if stated in the alternative[13]

It is also held that the inconsistency is not fatal if one averment does not necessarily negative the other,[14] and an affidavit is not defective because of statements in the disjunctive, where it is beyond the power of plaintiff to designate the precise mode, because of doubt as to the purpose or intent of the debtor, or for any other sufficient reason,[15] or where it is evident that defendant could not be surprised or prejudiced by the alternative statement[16]

c. Allegations as to Particular Grounds

(1) Absence, absconding, or concealment
(2) Fraud in incurring liability
(3) Fraudulent removal, disposition, or concealment of property
(4) Nonresidence

(1) Absence, Absconding, or Concealment

If the defendant's absence, absconding, or concealment is relied upon as a ground for attachment, if required by statute, the plaintiff's affidavit must charge that fact in a manner sufficient to comply with the statute.

If the ground of the application is the contemplated or actual departure or absconding of the debtor from the state or jurisdiction, or his concealment therein with intent to injure or defraud his creditors or to avoid the service of process, where the statute so requires, the affidavit must from the state as affiant believes to defraud his creditors or avoid summons or keeps himself concealed with such intent, is not bad as stating separate grounds in the alternative—Blevins v. Rice, 163 N W 770, 137 Minn 430—6 C J p 137 note 46 [b].

(2) In commenting upon Blevins v Rice, supra, the Minnesota court in a subsequent case said that "a single act was the basis for the attachment The intention the debtor had in mind when he acted could not be known save as it might be inferred from his act For this reason it was held that his intent might be averred in the alternative as different phases of the same act"—American Nat Bank of Lake Crystal v. Following words of statute

Where the statute requiring a statement of nonsecurity was in the following terms "that the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property; or, if originally so secured, that such security has, without any act of the plaintiff, or the person to whom the security was given, become valueless," the court in construing this statute with reference to the sufficiency of an affidavit said: "It would be proper to follow the language of the statute, in saying that payment had not been secured by any morigage or lien upon real or personal property . . . because it includes two or more phases of the same fact, attended with the same results, namely, that no security had ever been given; but to use the above language, and then say, 'or if originally so secured, such security has become valueless' is not to state either with certainty. It does not say that no security was ever given; neither does it say that security was given, but that the same has become valueless"—Wilke v. Cohn, 54 Cal 212, 213.

"Converting or about to convert"

An attachment sued on the ground that defendant has converted or is about to convert his property or a material part thereof into money with intent to defraud creditors, will not be quashed because the affidavit states that he is converting or about to convert his property or a material part thereof into money or other securities, as that is but a declaration of two phases of the same fact constituting the basis of attachment.—Hatfield v Blount, 103 S E 203, 86 W Va 411.

Assignment, disposal, or concealment

Where an affidavit, as a ground for attachment, states that defendant "has assigned, disposed of, or concealed, or is about to assign, dispose of, or conceal, any of his property with intent to defraud his creditors," the affidavit is not deficient as stating separate and distinct grounds in the alternative.—McCarthy Bros. Co v McLean County Farmers' El Co, 118 N W 1049, 1051, 18 N.D 176, 138 Am S R. 757, 20 Ann Cas 574—6 C.J p 137 note 46 [a]

Has disposed of or is about to dispose of

An affidavit for attachment, specifying as the ground thereof that defendant has assigned, secreted, or disposed of his property, or is about to do so with intent to delay or defraud his creditors, states two distinct grounds for attachment in the alternative, and is bad for that reason—American Nat Bank of Lake Crystal v. Klist, 192 N W. 190, 155 Minn 68

"It is impossible, frequently, for a creditor to ascertain whether a debtor has actually consummated a fraudulent transfer of his property, or whether he is about to do so; and therefore the Legislature has made these one ground for attachment. Fraudulent sales are generally secret, and it may be very difficult to say, at a given moment, whether they are fully accomplished or not Hence a party is permitted to state his case in the alternative, that the defendant has assigned, disposed of, or concealed, or is about to assign, dispose of, or conceal, his property, with intent to defraud his creditors"—Klenk v. allege such acts or conduct on the part of the debtor as will satisfactorily show the existence of the statutory ground.[17] As a rule, however, no more is required than that there shall be a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute respecting this ground therefor[18] by the statement of facts from which the court or officer can determine whether the departure, contemplated departure, or concealment, as the case may be, is sufficiently shown to entitle plaintiff to an attachment[19]

Where the statute permits an attachment only where defendant has departed from the state, an affidavit stating that defendant is "about" to depart is insufficient[20] On the other hand, where the fact that defendant is about to depart from the jurisdiction is a ground for attachment, such an averment is sufficient.[21]

An affidavit made in good faith on belief that defendant absconded from his creditors may be sufficient to sustain the attachment, although in fact at the time defendant resided within the state[22]

Where the seller in an action for the price of goods also sought an attachment upon the ground that defendant was about to remove from the state with the intent of defrauding his creditors, and the affidavit did not aver that the seller claimed a lien upon the property, as required by statute, the affidavit was insufficient to sustain an attachment[23]

Citizenship or residence of parties. If it is required that the creditor,[24] or the absconding or concealed debtor,[25] be a citizen or a resident of the state or some prescribed portion thereof, those facts must appear by appropriate allegations. It has been held, however, sufficient to state that the debtor has absconded from his usual place of abode without stating his residence positively,[26] and the fact of residence within the state may be implied from statements that the defendant conceals himself therein[27]

Time of absconding. When it is required to be shown that defendant absconded within a prescribed time after the injury complained of, such fact must be sufficiently averred or appear by fair inference.[28]

Intent. If the creditor relies on the fact or is required to state that the contemplated or actual departure or the concealment is with intent to avoid the service of process,[29] or that a removal of

Absconding from debtors

An affidavit, which expressly charged defendant with the unique and unusual proceeding of absconding from his debtors, is not a sufficient basis for the issuance of an attachment —Little v. Long, 107 A 412, 93 N J Law 99

Affidavits insufficient

(1) An affidavit merely alleging that defendant "absconds from his creditors, and is not a resident of the state of New Jersey, and that the summons cannot be served in this cause." without setting out any facts tending to prove such allegations, is insufficient —Henry v. Freeman, 145 A. 107, 7 N J Misc. 263.

(2) Under a statute authorizing an attachment where the debtor is an inhabitant of the state and has secretly departed from the state with intent to defraud his creditors or to avoid the service of summons, or keeps himself concealed within the state with the like intent, an affidavit and application for attachment, merely alleging that the debtor "formerly residing in the city of New York, but now absent therefrom or concealed therein, is an absconding or concealed debtor, and cannot be found," is insufficient —Castellanos v. Jones, 5 N Y. 164.

As against demurrer

An affidavit for attachment which sets forth that defendant is about to remove from the county is good against a general demurrer —Lawrence v Lee's Department Store, (Ga App) 172 S E 471

As explaining "conceal" and "abscond"

Where it was provided by statute that an attachment might issue upon complaint being made that "any person hath removed or is removing himself out of the county, 'privately,' or so absconds or conceals himself that the ordinary process of law cannot be served on such debtor," and where plaintiff in his affidavit alleged that defendant was "removing privately out of the county," to the best of his knowledge and belief, and that defendant was indebted to plaintiff, the affidavit was sufficient to sustain an attachment since the phrase "ordinary process of law cannot be served" relates to, and explains the meaning of the words "abscond" and "conceal."—Bank of Alabama v. Berry, 2 Humphr (Tenn) 442, 443.

Personal service outside of state

A statute regulating attachment, where defendant has left the state or has assigned property to defraud his creditors, is inapplicable, where personal service is made upon defendant without the state —Farlee v Farlee, 235 N Y.S 239, 134 Misc. 275.

Avoidance of service not shown

Where plaintiff in his affidavit for an attachment, on the ground that defendant was concealing himself in order to avoid service of summons, failed to set out any facts showing defendant knew that service of summons was sought to be made upon him, and it merely appeared that de-property was with intent to avoid service,[30] he must allege it in such a manner that the intent can be judicially inferred. It has been held, however, not necessary to show that the concealment is to avoid service of a summons in the particular action in which the attachment is sought.[31]

Where plaintiff is required by statute to charge that defendant is acting with the intent of defrauding his creditors,[32] or that defendant is acting to the injury of his creditors,[33] and the affidavit fails so to charge, it is insufficient to sustain an attachment. Such a recital, however, is unnecessary where the statute authorizes attachment regardless of the intention with which the debtor absconded or the effect of his departure upon his creditors,[34] and, where the object of the concealment is alleged to be for the purpose of avoiding the service of summons which is a sufficient ground for attachment, a further allegation of an intent to defraud creditors is not necessary.[35]

Negativing matters of defense. It is not necessary to state the period of defendant's absence, or that an attempt has been made to conceal his absence, where the residence of the debtor within the state during such period is a matter of defense.[36]

(2) Fraud in Incurring Liability

Where an attachment is sought upon the ground that the debtor acted fraudulently, if the statute so requires the affidavit must set forth the facts constituting such fraud, although in the absence of such a requirement a positive allegation of fraud is sufficient.

Where the statute does not require that plaintiff set out the facts in his affidavit, a general charge of fraud or that the debt sued on was fraudulently contracted will be sufficient.[37] Where, however, fendant was absent from his home at 9 p m when service was attempted upon him, the affidavit did not allege facts showing defendant concealed himself from service—Breakstone Bros. Bronx Branch v Hyman, 157 N.Y.S 898, 94 Misc. 171

Affidavit insufficient

An affidavit which avers that plaintiff has reason to believe, and does believe, that defendant is about to dispose of all his liquid assets to remove them beyond the reach of plaintiff so as to prevent plaintiff from collecting his debt, and which fails to set forth any facts as a basis for such belief, is insufficient—Stephens Howard Co. v. Baer, 166 S E 77, 203 N.C. 355.

Intent inferred

An intent to defraud his creditors may be inferred from facts set forth in plaintiff's affidavit showing conduct on defendant's part inconsistent with fair dealing—Grewer v Kinnischtske, 226 N.W. 812, 58 N.D 622.

In Pennsylvania

(1) An affidavit for an attachment under the act of 1869 is sufficient if it is made in the words of the act, or substantially in the words of the act, without setting out the specific acts constituting the fraud—Sharpless v Ziegler, 92 Pa 467—Holland v. Atzerodt, 1 Walk 237—Lit v. Williams, 15 Pa Dist 24, 32 Pa Co 151.

(2) Such affidavit is sufficient since the "design of the act, in this particular, was not so much to satisfy the mind of the prothonotary as to the rectitude of the application 'as to commit on oath the applicant to the truth of his allegations, in order that he might thereafter be legally liable therefor'" And accordingly an affidavit which alleges "that said goods were bought under false and fraudulent misrepresentations," and "that deponent is informed and believes that said defendant is about to assign and transfer his goods and chattels and property fraudulently, with the intent to cheat and defraud his creditors," substantially in the language of the statute, is sufficient—Goodman v. Sondheim, 3 Kulp 87, 88

(3) If, however, there is added by way of explanation, a charge of specific fraudulent acts, then the addition must be such that, taken by itself, it would be a good ground for an attachment.—Wolf v. Wentz, 5 Pa.Dist & Co 276—Boyd v Bright, 4 Pa Co. 518—6 C J p 140 note 73 [a].

(4) Where the affidavit is in the words of the act of 1869, proof can subsequently be taken by deposition, setting forth the particular acts constituting the fraud.—Harris v. Wood, 1 Pa Dist. 33.

(5) In such case plaintiff may establish the specific acts constituting the fraud at the hearing—Netter v. Harding, 6 Pa Dist. 169, 18 Pa.Co. 353.

(6) Similarly he may prove such specific acts upon a motion to dissolve the attachment—Hall v. Kintz, 18 Pa Co 24

(7) A general charge that defendants fraudulently contracted a debt, not made in the words of the statute, nor setting forth the specific acts constituting the fraud, such as artifice or false pretenses in contracting the debt is insufficient to sustain an attachment of property—Biddle v. Black, 99 Pa 330—Harrisburg Boot, etc, Co. v. Johnson, 3 Pa.Dist. 432—Miller v Shapiro, 12 Pa.Co 526—Chase v. Lennox, 2 Wkly N.C. 487—Bond v. Wheeler, 1 Wkly.N.C 282

(8) If the fraud is merely charged in the words of the act without allegations of specific acts, a general denial by defendant will justify the dissolution of the attachment if no testimony is taken—Netter v. Harding, 6 Pa Dist. 169, 18 Pa.Co. 353.

(9) In commenting upon the above rule the court has said, "We were at first inclined to think that the case of Biddle v Black, 99 Pa 330, modified the principle decided in the case of Sharpless v Ziegler, but, after a thorough examination of both cases, we are satisfied that there is no conflict whatever between them. In the latter case, the affidavit was held defective and the attachment was dissolved. The court, in its opinion, says: 'It does not set forth specifically the fraudulent acts of the defendant, nor is it made in the words of the statute. It does not sufficiently describe the kind of property, and is wholly silent as to the time the merchandise was purchased. The evidence did not establish that possession of the goods was obtained by artifice or false pretences, indicating an intention to defraud the vendors.' If this latter case proves anything, it proves that the affidavit must either set forth specifically the fraud-

it is required by the statute, the specific facts relied on to establish the fraud, or from which the court is asked to draw the inference of fraud, must be set out in such a manner as to justify the court or officer in granting the application.[38] The facts alleged must exclude every reasonable conclusion that the act was proper and innocent, and if they leave it doubtful whether the act was fraudulent or innocent, the affidavit will be insufficient.[39]

It is the better practice to state the place where the debt was contracted,[40] but the omission of such a statement will not vitiate the affidavit.[41]

Where it is necessary to show that alleged fraudulent statements were in writing, signed by the debtor or his agent, the statement must be attached to the affidavit or its substance set out.[42]

(3) Fraudulent Removal, Disposition, or Concealment of Property

(a) In general

(b) Intent

(c) Description of property removed

(a) In General

If fraudulent removal, disposition or concealment of property is relied upon as a ground for attachment, the affidavit for attachment must set forth such facts as the statute requires in regard thereto.

Where the statute does not require plaintiff to set out the facts upon which he relies in his affidavit for attachment, a positive statement in the affidavit that the debtor is fraudulently concealing or removing his assets from the jurisdiction is sufficient without setting forth the facts upon which plaintiff relies.[43] On the other hand, where the statute requires plaintiff to set forth the facts upon which he relies, an affidavit, based on the disposition, removal, or concealment by a debtor of his property, or his purpose to dispose of or secrete the same, with intent to defraud, hinder, or delay his creditors in the collection of their just claims, should state such specific facts and circumstances as will justify a conclusion as to the commission of the overt acts charged, and the existence of the fraudulent intent.[44] Although it is the better practice to set out this ground according to the terms ulent acts of the defendant or must be made in the words of the statute; and if made in the words of the statute, then the evidence must establish the specific acts of fraud, indicating an intention to defraud his creditors; otherwise, the attachment would be dissolved. It is true, there are a number of Common Pleas decisions which hold that where the affidavit specifically sets forth allegations of fraudulent acts, they must of themselves be sufficient ground to sustain the attachment, and this though there be a general charge of fraud within the words of the Act. In these opinions, however, it will be found, upon examination, that the judges deciding these principles at the same time conceded that it was sufficient if the affidavit had stopped after having made the charges of fraud, either literally or substantially in the language of the Act of Assembly, but that the affiant having undertaken to set out the particular acts of fraud, he was bound by them, and if they were insufficient to justify the proceedings that the attachment should be dissolved. Bank v. Tasker, 1 C.C. 173, Boyd v. Bright, 4 C.C. 518, and others"—Netter v Harding, 6 Pa.Dist. 169, 171, 18 Pa. Co. 353.

Affidavit held sufficient

Where the affidavit for attachment alleged, not only that defendant and his partner agreed to transfer their property to secure payment of the debts, but also represented the property could be sold for two thousand dollars or more clear of all debts and liabilities, whereas it was not worth to exceed three hundred dollars to four hundred dollars, which amounted in effect to a representation of solvency or the ownership and value of property, the affidavit was sufficient to sustain an attachment on the ground of fraud—Remington v. Fragulius, 208 P. 65, 120 Wash. 563.

Affidavit insufficient

A general charge of the borrower's intent not to return the loan, supported only by an averment of a plea of nonliability for debt in an action thereon, does not amount to a sufficient statement of facts in an attachment affidavit setting up as ground for attachment a fraudulent contraction of the debt—Teter v. Affidavits held sufficient

(1) Where plaintiff sought an attachment upon the ground that defendant was secreting and disposing of his property with the intent of defrauding his creditors, and alleged that defendant locked up his chattels and would not permit plaintiff to inspect them, his affidavit was sufficient to sustain an attachment—Lomin Corporation v. Kohlhepp, 271 N.Y.S. 709, 151 Misc. 545.

(2) Where an affidavit for attachment stated that one of defendants in the action stated that the officers of defendant unincorporated association had made arrangements to transfer the funds of the council to a private party, and that, if plaintiff did not bring suit, there would be no funds in the treasury with which to pay any money which might be recovered by plaintiff, the affidavit, setting forth facts that plaintiff was a creditor of defendants, and that they were about to assign or dispose of their property with intent to defraud plaintiff, was sufficient—Meinhart v. Contresta, 194 N.Y.S. 593.

Affidavit insufficient

That defendant was shipping lumber out of the state, which he had bought of plaintiff, with fraudulent intent, authorizing an attachment, was not shown by an affidavit alleging his failure to pay as per contract; the delivery of all the lumber to defendant; that the whole price of the statute, yet mere informalities or clerical omissions in the statements made are insufficient to defeat the right to the attachment if the requirements are substantially complied with,[45] but the omission of material statements or the failure to state in substance the essential requirements of the statute will render the affidavit insufficient.[46]

Where the specific facts constituting the fraudulent intent to dispose of property in order to defeat the claims of creditors must be set out by competent evidence, an affidavit showing facts based upon hearsay only,[47] or alleging only legal conclusions without setting out any ultimate facts,[48] is insufficient to sustain an attachment.

Where a statute authorizes the attachment if defendant is about to remove or has removed his property or a material part thereof out of the state, not leaving enough therein to satisfy plaintiff's claim, or the claim of defendant's creditors, the fact that there is insufficient property remaining to satisfy claims is material and must be set forth in the affidavit.[49]

Allegations not required by statute. Where the statute does not require such allegations it is not necessary for the affidavit to set forth that defendant cannot be found within the state,[50] that ordinary process of law cannot be secured,[51] that defendant is insolvent or a nonresident,[52] that there was an intent to defraud creditors,[53] the place of concealment,[54] or that the property disposed of was not a part of the debtor's homestead.[55] The presence of an unnecessary averment will not, however, invalidate the affidavit.[56]

(b) Intent

If the statute so requires, plaintiff must set forth in his affidavit that the transfer was made with fraudulent intent and the facts upon which he relies.

was due; that plaintiff had "learned" that defendant had shipped to another place, which was mere hearsay, that defendant's residence in the locality had been short, that defendant had declared his intention to continue shipping, without first paying, and that plaintiff thought defendant had little or no financial standing—Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co v Wilkins, 89 S E 659, 105 S C. 291

Violation of Bulk Sales Act

Where it is provided by statute that an attachment may issue upon proof by affidavit that defendant has disposed of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, and plaintiff in his affidavit avers that defendant has disposed of his property with a fraudulent intent, since he has disposed of it in violation of the Bulk Sales Law, such affidavit is insufficient, in the absence of any proof of an actual fraudulent intent on the part of defendant and in the absence of any statutory provision that such sale is fraudulent—Leventon v Davison, 127 A 787, affirmed 130 A 632, 102 N J Law 144.

45. Broocks v First Nat. Bank, (Tex Civ.App.) 65 S.W (2d) 521—6 C J. p 141 note 84.

Conversion of "this" instead of "his" property

A writ of attachment and the judgment foreclosing it are not void because the affidavit stated that defendant was about to convert "this," instead of "his," property into money for the purpose of placing it beyond his creditors' reach—Broocks v. First Nat. Bank, (Tex Civ App.) 65 S W (2d) 521.

46. Littlestown Sav Inst v. Bream, 121 S E 169, 95 W.Va. 351—6 C.J. p 142 note 85.

"About to convert" and "attempting to convert" not equivalent

Where the statute prescribes that plaintiff in order to entitle himself to an attachment must allege in his affidavit that defendant is "about to convert" his property with intent to defraud his creditors, an allegation that defendant is "attempting to convert" his property with such intent is insufficient, and will not sustain an attachment—Littlestown Sav Inst v. Bream, 121 S E 169, 95 W.Va 351

Omission of "by delay"

An affidavit for attachment omitting the words "by delay" before the words "in obtaining judgment or a return of no property found" is insufficient—Champion v. Ferguson, 43 S W (2d) 719, 241 Ky. 303.

47. Anderson v Malley, 181 N Y.S 729, 191 App Div 573.

Hearsay

(1) Where plaintiff sought an attachment upon the ground that defendant was about to assign and dispose of his property in order to defraud his creditors, and plaintiff in his affidavit set forth no acts constituting such fraud and only gave certain hearsay statements to the effect that such transfer was to be made, the affidavit was insufficient to sustain an attachment—Anderson v Malley, 181 N Y.S 729, 191 App Div. 573.

(2) Where plaintiff sought an attachment upon the ground that defendant was threatening to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, and plaintiff in his affidavit principally relied upon the statements of third persons, who were not shown to have refused on request to make affidavits, and it appeared from such affidavit that the only property which defendant was offering for sale and selling was that which defendant had presumably bought for resale, the affidavit was insufficient.—National Milk Products Mfg Co v. Gerard, 191 N.Y.S. 142, 199 App Div 958.

48. Rockfall Apartments v. Posner, 153 N Y.S 979.

Legal conclusion insufficient

Where action is brought to recover a debt, and not to foreclose upon the security, an affidavit which merely alleges that defendant is about to remove his property from the state with intent to defraud his creditors without setting forth any facts constituting such act, is insufficient—Rockfall Apartments v. Posner, 153 N.Y S. 979.

55. Grollman v Lipsitz, 21 S E. 272, 43 S C. 329.

56. Spear v. King, 14 Miss. 276.

Where an attachment is sought upon the ground that defendant is transferring or disposing of his property in order to defraud his creditors, defendant's fraudulent intent is an essential element and must be averred[57] This averment of defendant's fraudulent intent should be made substantially in the language of the statute,[58] but the exact words of the statute have been held unnecessary where words of an equivalent meaning are used[59] Where the statute requires the affidavit to set forth the facts upon which the conclusion of fraudulent intent is based, a mere averment of such intent without a showing of its factual basis is insufficient,[60] although such fraudulent intent need not be conclusively established by the facts so stated, it being sufficient if a fair inference of the existence of the intent can be inferred.[61]

Where the statute does not so require it is not necessary to show that the alleged fraudulent disposition was to avoid payment of a debt due to plaintiff.[62]

If the facts alleged are consistent with an honest purpose on the part of creditors to secure their just claims,[63] or are as consistent with an honest intent on defendant's part as with a dishonest one,[64] as where a disposition of property was not necessarily fraudulent, and plaintiff failed to negative defendant's good faith,[65] the attachment should not issue.

(c) Description of Property Removed

If the statute so requires, the affidavit must describe or designate the property which the defendant is disposing of or intends to dispose of with an intent to defraud.

If the statute so requires, it is necessary to describe or designate the property which has been or is about to be disposed of.[66] This description of the property must be sufficiently specific to identify and individuate the property about to be removed, and, accordingly, a mere averment that defendant is about to remove all his property, is insufficient.[67]

(4) Nonresidence

The affidavit must contain all the allegations in regard to residence of the parties required by statute.

Where an attachment is sought on the ground of defendant's nonresidence, if the statute so requires, the fact of nonresidence must be stated in the affidavit.[68] Under some statutes it is sufficient to state the ultimate fact of nonresidence, without setting out in detail the facts upon which such statement is based,[69] but under other statutes, an affidavit for an attachment on this ground should properly state facts and circumstances sufficient to authorize an inference that the debtor is a nonresident within the terms of the statute.[70]

Insolvency

A mere averment of insolvency, in an affidavit for attachment, on the part of the debtor at the time of his purchase, unaccompanied by any allegation of false representation or artifice, is insufficient—Miller v. Shapiro, 12 Pa Co 526.

58. Hey v. Harding, 53 S.W 33, 21 Ky L. 771—O'Connor v. Sherley, 53 S W 1056, 107 Ky 70, 21 Ky.L. 735.

Omission of word "intent"

Where an affidavit for an attachment alleged that "defendants . . have sold, conveyed, or otherwise disposed of their property with the fraudulent to cheat, hinder and delay their creditors" the affidavit was sufficient even though the word "intent" was omitted, since no one could "cheat" his creditors without having a "fraudulent intent"—Clolinger v Callahan, 263 S W. 700, 204 Ky. 33

Quantity of property

(1) It has been held that an affidavit for an attachment, based upon the ground that defendant is removing his property beyond the jurisdiction in order to defraud his creditors, need not state the quantity of the goods removed—Weilar v. Garner, 4 App D C 329.

(2) But there is an intimation in the language used in another case, that the quantity of the property removed must be given, the court saying: "There is an indefinite statement that the defendant in each case has removed some property at some time previous to the filing of the affidavit from the jurisdiction of this court for the purpose of having it sold at auction. That is so indefinite as to time, as to quantity and as to the surrounding circumstances as to make it, in the way of testimony, of scarcely any value whatever."—Boulter v Behrend, 20 D C 567, 568.

Allegation held sufficient

An affidavit for attachment stating "affiant has good reason to believe, and does believe, that the defendant is not a resident of the state of Missouri," conforms to the statute and is sufficient—Ellrod v. Carroll, (Mo) 202 S W. 4.

Knowledge of nonresidence inferred

Where an allegation is made on personal knowledge that plaintiff knows defendant, that he is a nonres-

Where attachment cannot issue against a nonresident joint debtor where the other joint debtors are residents, an affidavit in a proceeding against one nonresident joint debtor should affirmatively show the nonresidence of the other joint debtors [71]

In addition to the allegation of nonresidence, plaintiff is sometimes required to allege in his affidavit for attachment that defendant is not present within the county; and where such a requirement exists an affidavit which merely alleges that defendant is a nonresident, is insufficient.[72]

An averment of nonresidence in an affidavit for attachment is not conclusive between the parties or their privies,[73] and if the statement as to nonresidence proves untrue the attachment is wrongful and the proceedings are void.[74]

Residence of plaintiff. Where the ground of the application is that defendant is a nonresident, it is sometimes required by statute that plaintiff should show that he is a resident of the state, and if this allegation is necessary its absence will invalidate the affidavit.[75]

Place of defendant's residence. If not required by statute the place of defendant's residence, other than an averment of his nonresidence, is not essential and need not be stated in the affidavit for attachment.[76] If required by the statute, however, defendant's place of residence must be alleged,[77] or the affidavit must state that on diligent inquiry it cannot be ascertained.[78] Under such a statute, where there are several defendants, the place of residence of each defendant, or the fact that the place of residence of each cannot be ascertained, should be alleged.[79]

Inability to serve process. It is sometimes required that the affidavit shall show that, because of defendant's nonresidence, plaintiff is unable to serve process upon him;[80] and even if the statute does not require such an allegation the addition thereof is mere surplusage and not ground for quashing the attachment.[81]

§ 127. —— Negation of Improper Motive

Where the statute so requires, the plaintiff must allege in his affidavit that the attachment is not sought for the purpose of injuring the defendant or his creditors.

The affidavit is fatally defective where it fails to comply, at least substantially, with a statutory requirement that it shall allege that the attachment is not sued out for the purpose of injuring or harassing defendant,[82] or prosecuted in order to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor of defendant [83] Where it appears that there are two or more defendants against whom the attachment is sought, the affidavit must negative the existence of an improper motive as against all of the defendants; and accordingly a mere statement that an attachment was not sued out to harass defendant is insufficient [84] Where an attachment is sought against several defendants, and the statute requires the affidavit to negative an intent to hinder any creditor of any defendant against whom the attachment runs, an affidavit which fails to negative an intention to hinder any creditor of any number less than all of defendants is fatally defective [85]

On the other hand, a false allegation in the affidavit that the attachment was not sought for the purpose of hindering or defrauding creditors was immaterial, where it did not appear that the rights of creditors were fraudulently invaded by obtaining the attachment.[86]

ident, and that he resides in a certain town in an adjoining state, the affidavit is sufficient to justify an inference of satisfactory knowledge of nonresidence, although plaintiff was a stranger to the original transaction —Foster v. Rogers, 64 N Y S 652, 31 Misc. 14

Addition of words "or either of them"

Where it was provided by statute that the affidavit for an attachment should state that it was not sued out for the purpose of injuring or harassing defendant, and it was also provided by statute that in construing a statute the singular and plural should each include the other, unless otherwise expressly provided, it was held that an affidavit for an attachment against several defendants was sufficient where it alleged that the attachment was not sued out to injure or harass "defendants" without adding the words "or either of them."—Doty v. Moore, 112 S.W. 1038, 102 Tex 48, overruling (Civ. App) 113 S W. 955—6 C.J p 146 note 28 [b].

§ 128. —— Danger of Loss or Debt

If the statute so requires, the plaintiff in his affidavit for an attachment must allege that he is in danger of losing his debt.

Where plaintiff is required to show that there is a probability of losing his debt that fact should appear by a sufficient allegation.[87] The reasons for the apprehension of losing the debt should be shown by a statement of facts upon which the fear of loss is based,[88] and facts should be set forth showing that the property owned or possessed by defendant subject to attachment probably will not be available to execution when judgment is had.[89] However, an allegation to the effect that plaintiff is about to lose his debt has been held unnecessary where the attachment is sought on the ground of removal of property,[90] or the absconding, absence, or concealment of the debtor.[91]

Where there are several plaintiffs seeking an attachment, an affidavit by them alleging in the singular that "plaintiff" will probably lose his debt is insufficient.[92]

Where the statutory ground relied upon for attachment is that defendant does not have sufficient property to satisfy plaintiff's demand and the consequent endangering of its collection, and where the action is brought against joint obligors, an affidavit which alleges that one obligor does not have sufficient property to satisfy the demand without making a similar allegation as to the other defendant, does not state a good ground for attachment.[93]

§ 129. —— Lack of Security for Indebtedness

If the statute so requires, plaintiff must state that he has received no security for the indebtedness.

Plaintiff need not negative the existence of security where he is not required to do so by statute,[94] and accordingly, where the debt sued on was incurred prior to the passage of the statute requiring such an allegation,[95] or where plaintiff in a particular case is only required to show defendant's nonresidence,[96] the affidavit need not allege a lack of security; nor is plaintiff required to show by affidavit that the existing security is insufficient to discharge the debt sued on, in the absence of a statute prescribing such showing.[97]

An affidavit is fatally defective, however, where it fails to comply, at least substantially, with a statutory requirement that it shall state that the indebtedness for which the action is brought has not been secured by any mortgage or lien on real or personal property, or any pledge of personal property,[98] or that, although security was given, it has become valueless;[99] and to the latter allegation plaintiff is sometimes required to add that the security has become valueless without any act on his part.[1] Where plaintiff is required by statute to allege in his affidavit for an attachment that the debt "has not been secured," the affidavit is insufficient where it merely alleges that the "debt is not secured."[2] The fact that the allegation relative to the nonsecurity of the debt is made in the alternative, although rendering the attachment proceedings voidable, will not render such proceedings void.[3]

The affidavit for an attachment must follow the statutory requirement by negativing the existence of all the forms or means of security enumerated by it. Accordingly, where an affidavit alleges only that the debt is not secured by a mortgage, and fails to negative the existence of the other kinds of security, the affidavit is insufficient.[4]

A statutory ground for attachment, required to be set out in the affidavit, that defendant is indebted to plaintiff and that the payment of the debt has not been secured by any mortgage or lien on real or personal property, or any pledge of personal property, or if originally secured, that such security has, without any act of plaintiff, or the person to whom the security was given, become valueless, has been held to provide for two classes of affidavits. In neither class is one required to state the facts stated in the other class. The first class is where the debt has not been secured. Under such circumstances the affidavit must state that the payment of the debt has not been secured by any lien on real or personal property or any pledge of personal property.[5] The other class is where the debt has been secured, and there the affidavit must state the fact that security has been given, and also that such security has, without any act of plaintiff or the person to whom the security was given, become valueless. In this class it is not necessary to state that the debt has not been secured by any other mortgage or lien on real or personal property, or any pledge of personal property.[6] According to other authority, however, under a similar statute, this distinction is not recognized, and where an attaching creditor states in his affidavit that the indebtedness was originally secured and that the security has become valueless, he must also state that no further security has been given.[7]

§ 130. —— Averments As to Property of I fendant

An affidavit for attachment must contain all averments required by statute respecting the exister ownership, and character of defendant's property.

In the absence of any express or implied requi ment of the statute to that effect, it is not g erally necessary that an affidavit for attachm should show that defendant has real or perso property within the jurisdiction or within the stat or subject to execution within the jurisdiction the court.[9]

A compliance with a statutory requirement t the affidavit shall show that a nonresident deb has property within the state subject to atta ment,[10] or, where both parties are nonresider that defendant does not have sufficient prope within the state of his residence to satisfy t debt,[11] is essential. In case of foreign attachme where the statute so requires, it is also necessa that the affidavit should show that defendant is t owner of the property sought to be attached and where a petition for an attachment states fa showing that the property defendant is about place beyond plaintiff's reach and convert it money, is the property of the petitioning plaint no attachment can issue.[12]

Where plaintiff is required to state defendar title to property in his affidavit for attachment, has been held that he need not state it as ful or with the same degree of accuracy, as is requir where he is asserting his own title, because t character of the title of defendant lies peculia within his own knowledge.[14]

Allegation of possession

(1) If by statute plaintiff is entitled to a purchase-money attachment where the debtor has not paid for the property and is in possession of some portion of the property, or where the debtor has sold and is not in possession of a part of said property and has not been paid for the same, the fact that plaintiff, seeking a purchase money attachment, alleged in his affidavit that the property sold by him to defendant still remained in the hands of defendant, did not necessarily mean that defendant in possession had not parted with title to a third person—Ivey v. Kerce, 156 S E. 239, 42 Ga App. 336

(2) On the other hand, under such a statute, an allegation that the purchase money is due and that the purchaser has constructive possession of the property purchased, although the property is stored with plain at defendant's request, is sufficient show the existence of the ground attachment—Cochran Furniture v. While it has been held that an affidavit for a foreign attachment against the heirs of a judgment debtor must show, where no direct declaration is filed, that there is no personal representative or that there are no personal assets to discharge the debt,[15] it has also been held that in suing out an attachment against the heirs of a nonresident debtor it is not necessary to allege that there are no personal assets within the state, at least where the want of personal assets is sufficiently shown in the declaration.[16]

An affidavit based on a statute, providing that attachment may issue where defendant has no property in the state subject to execution, or not enough thereof to satisfy plaintiff's demand, is insufficient if it does not set forth such fact[17] It is not necessary that the affidavit use the exact statutory language in setting forth this fact, however, as other language conveying the same meaning is sufficient.[18]

Description of property. Where a description of property is necessary to inform the officer as to what property he is authorized to levy on, the affidavit must contain a description sufficient for that purpose,[19] which must be sworn to positively,[20] but, under a statute requiring plaintiff to state that defendant has property not exempt from execution which he refuses to give either in security or payment, it has been held that the affidavit need not describe the exempt property.[21] Also, where a general order of attachment was issued, plaintiff's failure to describe defendant's real property in his petition for attachment has been held immaterial[22]

Negativing exemption If the wages of a debtor within a certain amount are exempt the affidavit should contain a positive statement that the wages of the debtor exceed the amount which is exempt and that the excess only is sought to be attached[23] Where plaintiff fails to state in his affidavit that he is seeking to attach only the exempt property of defendant, it will be presumed that he is seeking to attach all of defendant's property;[24] and likewise, in the absence of a statement to the contrary in plaintiff's affidavit, it will be presumed that defendant is the head or support of a family, or the support of a widowed mother wholly dependent on him[25]

§ 131. —— Prayer

Generally, the petition or affidavit should contain a prayer for a writ of attachment.

The petition or affidavit should specifically ask that a writ of attachment be granted;[26] but in the absence of a statute requiring that the petition contain a prayer for attachment, such a prayer in the petition is unnecessary.[27]

§ 132. —— Signature and Verification

There must be a compliance with statutory requirements in regard to signature and verification

As discussed in the title Affidavits § 20 a, the object of a signature is to identify the person swearing to the affidavit, and in the absence of a statute requiring that the affidavit be signed, a signature is not generally necessary where the identity of affiant as such is otherwise sufficiently shown This rule applies to affidavits of attachment, and where the statute does not require that the affidavit or oath be signed, an omission of the signature is not fatal[28] Indeed, an attachment has been sustained where the affidavit was neither signed by affiant nor certified by the clerk of the court, the judge being satisfied from the evidence that the affidavit was, in fact, sworn to before the writ issued, and that the omission of plaintiff to sign, and the clerk to certify, the affidavit was an oversight[29] On the other hand, where the stat-

thereof, and in a bill in equity filed in the suit in which the affidavit was filed, it suffices, as to the assignment required by law to be effected by deed, to state and allege that the lease had been assigned and conveyed to defendant—Hale v Grow, 106 S E 409, 88 W.Va. 178

ute requires that the affidavit for attachment be signed, the lack of a signature thereto by the party purporting to make it is fatal,[30] and under some statutes, where an affidavit is purportedly made by several plaintiffs, the affidavit must be signed by each plaintiff personally, or by his agent or attorney.[31]

The affidavit is not invalidated by a slight variance in the spelling of affiant's name,[32] or the signature of the affidavit in the name of the person designated as affiant and of another not named.[33]

A failure to show that the affidavit was taken within the officer's jurisdiction has been held not to be a fatal defect.[34]

Authentication. Where the affidavit is taken without the jurisdiction, or in another state, the authority of the officer to administer the oath must be authenticated in a mode prescribed by the laws of the state where it is proposed to use the affidavit.[35]

Seal of officer. It has been held that an affidavit taken before a notary in the county in which the action is brought need not be authenticated under his notarial seal.[36]

Verification. The oath is an essential to an affidavit for attachment, and the affidavit should show that it was duly sworn to.[37] This should appear by the jurat or certificate of the officer by whom the oath is administered, which, where the statute so requires, should be signed by him with his official designation,[38] since an omission from the jurat which cannot be supplied by implication from the context is fatal.[39] Where, however, there is not a mandatory statute requiring the signature of the official administering the oath, if it appears that the oath was in fact administered, the omission of the officer to sign and certify the affidavit is not fatal,[40] but may be cured before the return of the writ,[41] or the officer may be permitted to sign the jurat nunc pro tunc.[42]

Where the official character of the officer taking the affidavit is not stated in the jurat, but sufficiently appears from a reference to the other papers in the record, the affidavit is sufficient.[43] Also, where the oath is administered by the clerk of court, an omission in the jurat of his official character, and a failure to place the seal of the court on the paper, is not such a defect as to render the affidavit void, since the affidavit is not a process intended to be taken beyond the custody of the clerk and judge, and there served.[44]

§ 133. —— Approval

If the statute so requires, the affidavit should bear a sufficient indorsement by the proper officer showing his approval thereof.

If it is required that satisfaction with the affidavit should appear by a certificate indorsed thereon, the affidavit should bear a sufficient indorsement by the proper officer showing his approval thereof.[45] An indorsement that the officer was satisfied that the matters set forth in the affidavit were true has been held sufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ, although the ground therefor was alleged on information and belief.[46]

§ 134. Examination of Plaintiff and Indorsement on Application

Where the statute so requires plaintiff must submit to an examination and obtain the indorsement of the judge as to the amount for which the writ shall issue.

Judicial notice

Since the court or judge should judicially take notice of who is the clerk, and of his signature, there is no overwhelming necessity for the clerk to describe himself or his office very particularly, or to place the seal of the court on the paper.—Simon v. Stetter, 25 Kan. 155

46. Clark v. Gilbert, 1 Pinn.(Wis.) 354.

As a prerequisite to obtaining a writ of attachment plaintiff is sometimes required by statute to apply therefor to a judge or master in chancery, who shall examine him under oath concerning his cause of action, and who, thereupon, if he finds plaintiff entitled to an attachment, shall indorse on the application the amount for which the writ shall issue.[47] A statute so providing has been held not to contemplate an examination before a court in session and a record of the proceedings,[48] and where the judge has ordered the writ, it must be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that he heard such evidence and made such examination as the statute requires.[49]

§ 135. Presentation and Filing in General

Plaintiff should comply with the statutory requirements, if any, in regard to filing the affidavit and declaration.

The statutes sometimes require the filing of the affidavit A failure to comply with a mandatory statute requiring that the affidavit be filed at the time of the issue of the writ of attachment, or within a prescribed time thereafter, will generally invalidate the proceedings[50] The motive of the provisions of such a statute is to insure to defendant in attachment the right to inspect the affidavits on which the warrant of attachment was issued,[51] to prevent the abuse of the process of the law, and to provide against a wanton and groundless seizure of the defendant's effects[52] A statute requiring an affidavit to be filed is not satisfied by filing a copy of the affidavit,[53] or by serving a copy of the affidavit on defendant,[54] although a handing of a copy of the declaration to the clerk of the court or deputy to be filed is a sufficient compliance with a statutory requirement that it be filed.[55]

Under an appropriate statute, where an affidavit in an attachment proceeding is properly filed and not withdrawn, any number of attachments can issue therefrom until a levy is made under the warrant, and it is not necessary that a new affidavit be filed each time a warrant is issued.[56]

On the other hand, where the validity of the warrant or the proceedings on it are not made to depend on a compliance with a direction as to the filing of the affidavits, a failure to file the affidavit within the time prescribed by statute does not invalidate the attachment.[57]

It has also been held that the judgment cannot be collaterally attacked because the record fails to show that the affidavit was filed[58]

Under some statutes a declaration in attachment may be filed at any time during the term to which the attachment is returnable.[59]

§ 136. Producing Evidence of Debt

If the statute so requires, plaintiff must produce the evidence of his debt at the time of presenting the affidavit.

To be entitled to a writ of attachment plaintiff must comply with a statutory requirement that he produce the evidence of the debt at the time of presenting the affidavit.[60] Under such a statute, it is not necessary that plaintiff should produce all the evidence on which he relies to establish his claim at the trial,[61] and so an attachment may issue against the indorser of a negotiable promissory note on production of the note without proof of its indorsement by the debtor,[62] or on a note written in a foreign language unaccompanied by a translation thereof,[63] and it is sufficient if plaintiff produces an agreement containing dependent covenants sued on,[64] or if he files his cause of action and this shows on its face the specific, liquidated, and ascertained debt sued for.[65] Under such a statute an attachment may issue on the record of a foreign judgment,[66] or transcript of a judgment rendered in another state.[67] Although the statute requires the production of the voucher and evidence of the debt, it has been held that there is sufficient evidence to support the writ where an itemized account with all the debits and credits is filed along with the contract.[68] Such a provision, however, has been held to make it necessary for an assignee to produce the assignment of the claim by the original creditor.[69]

§ 137. Effect of Delay after Making

Delay between the time of the making of the affidavit for attachment and the time of the issuance of the writ, may render the affidavit ineffective.

The affidavit should be made at or as near the time of the issuance of the writ as is practicable,[70] and since the ground of attachment must exist at the time the warrant is issued, any delay between the making of the affidavit and its presentation or filing, during which a change in condition may have taken place, may render the affidavit ineffectual.[71] Such a delay, however, does not necessarily render the affidavit ineffectual,[72] and accordingly, the proceedings may be upheld, notwithstanding a failure promptly to present or file the affidavit, where it is apparent that no substantial change in condition could have taken place,[73] or where the delay was caused by the fact that affiant resided in a distant jurisdiction.[74] Similarly, it has been held that a delay between the filing of the affidavit and the execution of the warrant does not invalidate the attachment,[75] and where the affidavit charges some fact which, having occurred, is not subject to change, as, for example, where it is alleged that a debt was fraudulently contracted, the fact that such affidavit was sworn to some time before the action was commenced will not render it ineffectual.[76]

§ 138. Laches of Clerk or Other Officer

Where plaintiff has observed all the statutory requirements respecting the filing and signing of the affidavit or petition for attachment, failure of the clerk to file or properly sign it will not generally invalidate the proceedings.

If plaintiff has observed the requirements of the statute, the neglect of the clerk or of the officer charged with that duty to place the affidavit on file, as required by law, and to keep it on file, will generally not affect the validity of the proceedings, where no injury has been caused by such neglect.[77] The failure of a clerk to indorse on the petition the time of its filing, does not, ipso facto, destroy the validity of attachment.[78] Where plaintiff was required to file his declaration in attachment, and it was established that he actually gave it to the proper officer for the purpose of filing, the fact that the declaration was not filed, did not invalidate the proceeding, since such defect could be cured by a nunc pro tunc order.[79] Similarly, where it was shown that the clerk inadvertently failed to enter the date of filing on the declaration in attachment, it was held that the clerk could be ordered to enter the declaration filed as of the true date, nunc pro tunc.[80] If the affidavit, however, is not delivered to the clerk as clerk to be filed, and the clerk as clerk does not receive it to be kept on file, it is not filed as a matter of law.[81]

Without instructions
Where plaintiff's affidavit was on the same sheet of paper as that which contained the warrant issued for the attachment, and where the sheet was left with the clerk without instructions, and he made no indorsement of filing on the affidavit, but delivered the sheet to the sheriff, and where the sheet was not in the clerk's custody within the time required for it to be filed, it was not filed within the prescribed time.—Townsend v. Sparks, 27 S E. 801, 50 S.C. 380.

§ 139. Variance between Affidavit and Pleading

A material variance between the allegations in the declaration or petition and the affidavit for attachment may be fatal.

A material inconsistency between the claim stated in an affidavit for an attachment and the demand set up in the declaration constitutes a variance fatal to the attachment,[82] although an immaterial variance in this regard is not necessarily fatal.[83] Accordingly, a substantial variance between the statements of the affidavit and the complaint or declaration as to the amount of the claim may be fatal,[84] although, according to some authority, no advantage can be taken of such a variance, except where the declaration counts on a different cause of action from that stated in the affidavit.[85] It has also been indicated that plaintiff may secure an attachment for a sum less than the total amount claimed in the petition, and accordingly, such a variance is not fatal.[86]

Although a slight variance between the statement of the amount in the affidavit and petition, which could not be held to be immaterial under the circumstances, has been held to be fatal,[87] the general rule is that a slight variance between the affidavit and the declaration or complaint in stating the amount of the indebtedness claimed,[88] or a claim in the pleading of an amount greater[89] or even in some cases less[90] than that alleged in the affidavit will not ordinarily vitiate the proceedings, especially where the sum claimed can be ascertained by computation,[91] and the dissolution of an attachment has been refused where the affidavit and petition claimed a larger amount than the bill of items annexed to the petition.[92]

A material variance between the name of plaintiff in the petition and in the affidavit for attachment is also fatal.[93] Accordingly, an attachment proceeding on an affidavit in the name of an individual will not support a declaration in the name of a partnership in the absence of any waiver of such variance.[94]

According to some authority, an affidavit for at-

83. Fraud

(1) Where plaintiff is given the right to an attachment if the affidavit shows that a debt is due for property obtained by false pretenses, and plaintiff in his petition alleges only an action for debt, and the statute does not require the action to be predicated on false pretenses, the fact that the affidavit alleges that the debt was fraudulently contracted does not constitute a fatal variance between the petition and the affidavit, the court saying "it might appear anomalous to compel the plaintiff to allege such fraud as a constituent of his cause of action, when he is clearly entitled to simple action of debt upon the guaranty, without setting out the fraud inducing the debt."—Slaughter v Morton, (Tex Civ App.) 185 S.W. 905, 906, error refused.

(2) Where an attachment issued on the ground of fraud in procuring the debt sued on as shown by the affidavit, the attachment will not be discharged because the complaint in the suit did not allege the fraud on which the attachment was based, where both the complaint and affidavit stated that defendant incurred a debt with plaintiff, and the affidavit alone added that such debt was contracted in consequence of defendant's fraud—Remington v. Fragulius, 208 P. 65, 120 Wash. 563.

Variance in recital on writ

Where the writ of attachment issued by the clerk and his subsequent schedule of goods attached were on forms reciting that the debtor was a nonresident, and plaintiff had obtained his attachment on the ground that the debtor had absconded, such inconsistency did not affect plaintiff's right to the attachment and he was only required to maintain his allegation that defendant had absconded —Obrecht v. tachment will not control contrary allegations in the petition,[95] and the meaning and nature of the cause of action as stated in the petition cannot be varied by the affidavits,[96] but it has also been held that the allegations in the petition will not control the allegations in the affidavit where there is a variance between the petition and the affidavit as to the ground for the attachment[97]

Interest. Where the affidavit differs from the complaint and writ, in that it does not claim interest from a certain date on the amount of indebtedness, there is no substantial variance[98]

Time to raise objection An objection for a variance curable by amendment should be timely raised[99]

§ 140. Variance between Affidavit and Evidence

The allegations and contents of the affidavit for attachment must be substantially sustained by the evidence.

The matters stated in the affidavit for attachment must be substantially sustained by the evidence,[1] and an affidavit for attachment on one ground cannot be sustained by proof of the existence of another ground.[2] Also, where the grounds relied on in the affidavit are not sustained, the attachment cannot be saved by the fact that the evidence strongly tends to indicate the existence of another ground not alleged in the affidavit[3] Likewise, where an attachment issued on two causes of action is an entirety, and the proof shows that one of the causes would not support an attachment, the attachment must be dissolved in toto[4]

Where a charge in an affidavit that defendant is about to do a certain thing is a distinct ground for attachment in itself, independent of the ground that he has actually done such thing, proof of one does not sustain the other. Accordingly, a ground asserted in an affidavit for attachment that defendant is about to assign or secrete his property in order to defraud his creditors, is not supported by proof that defendant has assigned his property.[5]

On the other hand, a slight discrepancy between the amount claimed in an affidavit for attachment and the amount shown to be actually due will not vitiate the proceeding[6]

Where a ground for an attachment is proved and found to have existed as to part of a debt and not as to the remainder of the debt, the attachment will only be sustained as to the amount for which grounds for attachment exist[7]

§ 141. Defects, Objections, and Waiver

a. In general
b Defects cured
c Waiver
d. Objections

a. In General

A defect in an affidavit for attachment which defeats jurisdiction is fatal, but mere clerical errors or defects of form may be disregarded.

It may be stated as a general rule that an affidavit for attachment which is materially defective, in that it does not substantially comply with the essential statutory requirements, so as to deprive the court of jurisdiction, is void and insufficient to serve as a basis for attachment, and the attachment and all proceedings subsequent thereto, which are dependent thereon, are also void.[8] Mere informalities, defects, or clerical errors or misprisions in affidavits for an attachment, however, which do not prejudice substantial rights may be disregarded[9] An affidavit may be defective in

Clerical error
Where an affidavit for attachment had all the formal and substantial facts set forth necessary to obtain a warrant of attachment, and it recited, "M . . . being duly sworn," but it was in fact signed by B, such error was held to be clerical only and not to affect the validity of the attachment, in view of a statute pro-

respect to some substantive particular, and yet not be absolutely void, where it clearly appears that there has been an honest attempt to follow the statute,[10] and where the court acquires jurisdiction by the levy of the writ, it does not lose such jurisdiction because of defects in the affidavit.[11]

Any defect in an attachment affidavit can only affect the attachment proceedings, and not the suit or action on which the attachment issued.[12]

Advertisement and affidavit. Where notice advertising the fact that an attachment has been issued, in order that any person having a greater demand against the debtor than is cognizable before the court issuing the attachment may have an opportunity to take out an attachment, is necessary, a description of the debtor as an absconding debtor in the advertisement, when the affidavit for attachment has described him as a nonresident, is not such a variance as will vitiate the writ, since the affidavit is the foundation on which the writ is issued.[13]

Effect of statute making affidavit sufficient evidence. If, by statute, the affidavit is made sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated, its truth cannot be called in question, defendant being confined to his remedy on the bond.[14]

No presumption can be indulged to support an affidavit defective in any substantial particulars.[15]

b. Defects Cured

(1) In general
(2) Aider by pleadings

(1) In General

A defect in an affidavit or petition for attachment may sometimes be cured on the hearing or subsequent proceeding.

A defect or omission in plaintiff's affidavit for attachment may be cured by defendant's affidavit, where the omitted matter appears therein,[16] or the defect may be cured by the evidence adduced at the trial.[17] Accordingly, it has been held that if the evidence on the hearing supplies the defects in the affidavit, it will be sufficient where the motion to quash is not made on plaintiff's papers.[18] The failure of an affidavit for attachment against partners to state that the individuals have not enough property to satisfy the demand sued on, may be cured by a judgment sustaining the attachment, at least where no motion has been made during the progress of the action to discharge the attachment on that ground.[19] viding that any error or defect in a proceeding which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party shall be disregarded—T C May Co v. Mennies Shoe Co., 119 S E 227, 186 N C 144.

Defect not fatal

An affidavit of nonresidence and indebtedness was sufficient, and an attachment properly issued thereon, where the affidavit and writ pointed to the beginning of an action under the attachment statute, although the complaint was filed out of time, without filing bond, or without obtaining order fixing amount thereof.—Park Lane Realty Co v. Void affidavit considered as testimony

Where a creditor, by petition to the judge sought and obtained an attachment, and after issuance of the writ defendant demurred to the attachment because the affidavit was defectively verified, it was held, under a statute permitting the issuance of an attachment on petition of the creditor supported by an affidavit, or testimony, that the affidavit, although void as an affidavit, might be considered as testimony in support of the allegations in the petition—Strother v So States Phosphate & Fertilizer Co, 125 S E 786, 33 Ga App 314

"Furthermore, where a writ of attachment has been issued and levied, the preliminary affidavit has served its purpose, and even though it be defective and an appellate court might find in it sufficient error to reverse the judgment, this does not deprive the court of the jurisdiction acquired by the levy of the writ"—Stephenson v. Kirtley, (W Va) 46 S Ct. 50, 51, 269 U.S. 163, 70 L Ed. 213.

Voidable

An order of sale on an attachment issued on a defective affidavit is not void but voidable The proceeding is irregular and is ineffectual in respect to bona fide liens subsequently acquired on the property until corrected—United Collieries v. Martin, 60 S W (2d) 125, 243 Ky 808, 89 A L R 971.

Defect cured by admission

A defect in the proof given by plaintiff as to defendant's residence may be cured by an admission made by defendant in his affidavit in support of his motion to vacate the attachment—Vogelman v. Lewit, 96 N. Y S 207, 48 Misc 625.

Notice not curing defect

Under a statute requiring plaintiff to state in his affidavit for attachment that an attachment is only sought of the ten per cent of the debtor's wage which is not exempt, the failure of plaintiff to so state in his affidavit is not cured by the fact that plaintiff gave notice that the attachment was only sought on the ten per cent—Meade v. Rice, 19 Ohio N P (N S) 173

19. O'Connor v. Sherley, 52 S W. 1056, 107 Ky. 70, 21 Ky L 735.

(2) Aider by Pleadings

Where permissible under the statute, a defect in the affidavit may be cured or supplied by the pleadings.

Where it is permissible under the statute, the affidavit and the complaint in the action may be read together for the purpose of determining whether the right to attachment exists,[20] particularly where the complaint is referred to in the affidavit, as already considered in § 116, where the complaint is also verified,[21] or where it is filed therewith.[22] Also, under some statutes, an insufficient allegation in an affidavit for attachment may be aided by the answer filed by defendant.[23]

On the other hand, in view of the fact that attachment is a harsh statutory remedy and is strictly construed, where the statute requires the affidavit to state the nature of plaintiff's claim, a failure to do so is fatal, and the court cannot look to the declaration or complaint to supply this deficiency,[24] or to process or papers in proceedings subsequently prepared or filed.[25]

If there are ambiguous statements in the affidavit, which are explained in the allegations of the petition, the petition may be considered as explanatory of those statements.[26] In the absence of a permissive statute, however, the petition is not a part of the affidavit for attachment, and where the affidavit is not ambiguous, reference cannot be had to the petition to explain the affidavit.[27]

Claim or indebtedness. Under a permissive statute, if the affidavit, otherwise sufficient to show grounds for attachment, lacks precision in stating plaintiff's demand, recourse may be had to the declaration or complaint, and if that pleading is sufficiently specific the proceedings will not be affected by the deficiencies of the affidavit.[28] Where the complaint and affidavit are both on file, and where the statement of plaintiff's claim in the affidavit shows that it is one for which an attachment may issue, but is not as full as might be desired, reference may also be had to the complaint to ascertain the precise nature of plaintiff's claim.[29]

Collateral attack It has also been held that, on collateral attack, reference may be had to the bond and petition to explain an allegation of nonresidence contained in the affidavit.[30]

Time of maturity of debt. Under some statutes it is unnecessary that the affidavit shall state when the debt matured, but it will be sufficient if the petition shows that fact,[31] or if the petition sets forth the contract sued on so that the date of its maturity can be determined.[32]

c. Waiver

Nonjurisdictional defects in the affidavit for attachment may be waived.

Nonjurisdictional defects or irregularities in the affidavit for attachment, which can be waived by defendant, may be waived by a failure to raise

Affidavit and complaint stating cause for attachment

Where the affidavit in an attachment proceeding alleged plaintiff sold goods to defendant, that defendant failed and refused to pay for them, and that defendant was about to remove such goods out of the state, and where the complaint alleged the same facts, and in addition alleged that defendant was removing such property out of the state with intent to cheat and defraud the owners thereof, the court held that the allegations in the affidavit, supplemented by the allegations in the complaint, were sufficient to support the inference that defendant was about to remove his property out of the state with intent to defraud his creditors.—Ingalls v. Nutter, 172 N.Y.S. 210

Absconding or concealment

An omission in the affidavit of a statement that the absconding or concealment occurred within a prescribed time after the injury, as required by the statute, cannot be supplied by an allegation sufficient in that respect contained in the declaration.—Webb v. Bowler, 50 N.C. 362

Aider by answer

Where an affidavit in an attachment was defective in failing to state the grounds on which plaintiff's belief that defendant was about to dispose of money with intent to defraud creditors was based, the court held that it was not aided by the answer of defendant.—First Nat. timely objection;[33] by appearing generally[34] and replevying the attached property,[35] by pleading to, or defending on, the merits[36] or confessing judgment;[37] by filing a plea in abatement,[38] by taking issue on the allegation of facts contained in the affidavit,[39] and going to trial on the issues so raised;[40] by agreeing that the attachment as to certain property shall be valid;[41] or by failing to request an adjudication as to the sufficiency of the grounds alleged on motion to discharge the attachment for an insufficient statement thereof[42]

On the other hand, where the defect is of such a character as to prevent the court from acquiring jurisdiction, it cannot be waived[43] Consequently, defects consisting of the want of affiant's signature or that of the clerk or the seal of the court, where they are jurisdictional, are not waived by the fact that defendant appeared and pleaded to an amended affidavit subsequently filed after a motion to dismiss the attachment on that ground had been overruled[44]

d. Objections

(1) Who may object
(2) Time of taking
(3) Mode of objecting

(1) Who May Object

Where the affidavit for attachment is sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the court, only a party to the proceeding may ordinarily object to defects appearing therein.

See Gans v. Lincoln Stars, 209 Ill. App. 400
Time for taking objections see infra subdivision d (2) of this section.

Failure to swear to affidavit
The failure to swear to an affidavit for attachment against a nonresident is a defect which can be urged against the proceedings before trial, but it is a matter which the defendant can waive, and it will not render the judgment foreclosing the attachment lien void.—Hester v. Baskin, (Tex.Civ App.) 184 S W. 726

Failure to traverse
Where defendant fails to traverse the charges in an affidavit for attachment, the rule requiring plaintiff to prove such charges by further evidence does not apply—Jandera v Lakefield Farmers' Union, 185 N.W. 656, 150 Minn. 476

34. Borough v Jones, 18 Pa Co 261—6 C J p 154 note 16

36. Carter Grocery Co v Wilson, 153 S E 566, 156 S C 546, 72 A L R 118—6 C J p 154 note 18.

Affidavit defending on merits
Where defendant, before serving notice of a motion to vacate an attachment, served an affidavit on the sheriff alleging that the amount claimed by plaintiff was unjust, he waived his objection to defects or irregularities in the affidavit on which the attachment was granted—Reames v. Lawrence, 106 S E 31, 115 S C. 419.

Matters in abatement
It is not sufficient merely to put in issue the grounds alleged for an attachment by answer, and the filing of an answer is a waiver of matters which go in abatement of the writ Accordingly, the chancellor correctly sustained an attachment levied on property of defendant, where no plea in abatement was filed traversing the grounds alleged for the issuance of the attachment—Cate v Popejoy, (Tenn App) 94 S W (2d) 51

41. Union Trust Company v. Biggs, 137 A. 509, 153 Md 50.

Agreement constituting waiver
Where it was agreed between the creditor and the debtor against whom an attachment was obtained that the attachment should be released as to a part of the property levied on, and that it should be "retained as a valid attachment against the remainder of the tract," the court said that whatever the substance of the objection of defendant to the affidavit, short note, declaration, voucher, pleading and interrogatory in the attachment proceedings, such objections were waived by such written agreement.—Union Trust Co. v. Biggs, 137 A. 509, 153 Md 50.

43. United Collieries v. Martin, 60 S W.(2d) 125, 248 Ky. 808, 89 A L R. 971.

Effect of judgment
An attachment, void because of the insufficiency of the affidavit, is not made valid by the subsequent rendition of a judgment for plaintiff—Maguire v. Bolen, 68 N W. 408, 94 Wis. 48.

44. Sedalia Third Nat Bank v Garton, 40 Mo App 113, 122, 123
"Plaintiff's counsel, however, insists, that, even to admit that the writ of attachment was issued in the absence of an affidavit, yet that defendants waived the necessity thereof by appearing and pleading to an affidavit, subsequently filed in the court We cannot concur with counsel on the position, thus taken. It is well understood that, in the matter of jurisdiction over the person, a defendant may appear in court and submit himself to the jurisdiction thereof in the face of defective, or even void, process, and that he cannot thereafter complain of such want of process, since he will be deemed to have waived the necessity thereof. However, this rule has no application here, in a proceeding in its nature in rem—where the court seeks by its process to bring the thing in court, with the purpose of subjecting such thing to the payment of plaintiff's claim. It is an extraordinary process, and the statute law has provided a means whereby the res may be brought into the jurisdiction of the court The presence or absence of defendant in the suit has nothing to do with the presence or absence of the attached property. In other words the defendant may be present and yet the defendant's property absent, or not within the court's jurisdiction. . . . In our opinion then the writ of attachment, issued in this cause, was an attempted process without jurisdiction The court did not thereby acquire jurisdiction over the subject-matter. It was a void proceeding from the beginning, and, as jurisdiction never attached, advantage thereof could be taken at any time. . . . And since the court never acquired, under the law, jurisdiction of the subject-matter, consent of the parties cannot confer jurisdiction"—Sedalia Third Nat Bank v. Garton, supra.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary,[45] if the defects in the affidavit consist of mere informalities or irregularities, the proceedings are regarded as voidable only at the instance of a party to the proceeding in which the attachment is issued,[46] and, in the absence of fraud or collusion, no objection on account of irregularities can be raised by strangers to the action.[47]

(2) Time of Taking

Objections to the affidavit for attachment not going to the jurisdiction of the court must be timely raised.

Objections to the sufficiency of the affidavit for attachment, if not raising jurisdictional questions, must be made timely,[48] and where defendant failed to object to the falsity of an affidavit for an attachment in the proceedings therefor, he could not, for the first time raise such objection after judgment, at least in the absence of plaintiff's fraud or collusion.[49] However, unless otherwise provided by statute, objections for insufficiency to confer jurisdiction may be made at any stage of the proceedings,[50] but if the statute requires defendant to appear and plead before he can except to the sufficiency of the affidavit, an exception taken before he pleads is premature.[51]

After issue made and trial begun on the merits of a case, it is too late for an objection to the petition for want of verification where, under the statute, verification is not essential to jurisdiction.[52]

(3) Mode of Objecting

An objection to a defect in an affidavit for attachment must be made in the mode prescribed by statute.

The mode of raising objection to an insufficient affidavit for attachment depends primarily on the statutes and practice in the particular jurisdiction. In some jurisdictions such objection must be taken by plea in abatement,[53] and accordingly, it has been held in such a jurisdiction that the truth of the ground of attachment stated in the affidavit may only be inquired into by such plea.[54] In other jurisdictions the proceeding is by a motion to dissolve the attachment,[55] or by motion to quash.[56] Alleged defects will not be considered on mandamus,[57] nor can the sufficiency of the facts stated be tested by demurrer to a petition containing similar statements.[58] If the affidavit in an action commenced by attachment alleges a cause of action as for a trespass to land, and the complaint is for conversion, demurrer will not lie, but a summary application to set the declaration aside should be made.[59] It is not proper to strike out statements in the affidavit because they are immaterial or disclose no ground for attachment.[60] Under a statute providing that the facts stated as the cause of attachment cannot be contested by a mere denial, it has been held that defendant cannot interpose a defense by a mere denial, or by an answer specifically traversing the allegations of the petition with respect to the said grounds of attachment.[61]

45. Statute extending right
In Iowa, it is provided by statute that "any person other than the defendant may, before the sale of any attached property, or before the payment to the plaintiff of the proceeds thereof, or any attached debt, present his petition, verified by oath to the court, disputing the validity of the attachment, or stating a claim to the property or money, or to an interest in or lien on it, under any other attachment or otherwise, and setting forth the facts upon which the claim is founded"—Thielen v Schechinger, 230 N W 516, 517, 210 Iowa 224

Objection by person other than party
Where plaintiff company brought suit against defendant and attached his property, and later, in another proceeding, another company, as plaintiff, also brought an action and had an attachment levied on the property of defendant, the fact that the affidavit for an attachment made by the first company in its proceeding was defective in not properly negativing the existence of security for the indebtedness, where not objected to by defendant in such proceeding, could not be objected to by the second company, in their proceeding, where the defect in the affidavit in the original proceeding did not deprive the court of its jurisdiction—Patch v. Stewart, 253 P. 254, 78 Mont 192, followed in Bancroft v Leverty, 254 P 1113, 78 Mont 559.

61. Thielen v Schechinger, 230 N. W. 516, 210 Iowa 224.

The objection should be specific and should point out in what respect the affidavit is defective and a mere objection that no sufficient affidavit has been filed is too general.[62] Where the objection is required to be taken by a plea in abatement the plea must be properly drawn.[63]

Traverse of affidavit. A traverse of the allegations contained in an affidavit for attachment does not bring in issue either the knowledge or authority of affiant, which are not traversable facts.[64]

§ 142. Effect of Determination of Insufficiency

No further proceedings can be had on an affidavit which has been held insufficient.

When affidavits in attachment have been held insufficient, no subsequent proceedings based on them can be had.[65] Under a statute, however, providing that any creditor of defendant, on filing his affidavit and written undertaking, may, at any time before the final adjustment of the suit, become a party to the action, file his complaint, and prove his claim or demand against defendant, and under a further statutory provision that a dismissal of his action or proceedings in attachment by the first attaching creditor shall not operate as a dismissal of the action or proceeding of any subsequent attaching creditor, the rights of other creditors, who have come in under an attachment issued on a defective affidavit, whose proceedings are regular, are not lost by the quashing of the original attachment.[66]

b. Time for application for amendment

a. In General

(1) Rule stated
(2) Applications of rule

(1) Rule Stated

Ordinarily, under the statutes mere defects of form in an affidavit for attachment may be cured by amendment, but, in the absence of statutory permission, this right to amendment does not extend to defects of substance.

As a general rule, an affidavit or application for attachment which contains the substantial elements required by the statute,[67] and which contains clerical,[68] technical,[69] or formal[70] defects, is amendable, and may be corrected by amendment. On the other hand, in view of the fact that attachment is a statutory remedy and that the statutory procedure must be strictly followed, an application or affidavit containing material defects, or defects of substance, such as to deprive the court of jurisdiction over the res or property sought to be attached, is not amendable, and cannot be cured by amendment,[71] except where the right to amend has been extended

Where a statute provides that an affidavit for an attachment may be amended if the attachment writ has been quashed, such statute must be followed and it is error to refuse an amendment after the writ is quashed—McSwain v. Cephus, 69 So. 178, 109 Miss 368.

by statute to matters of substance.[72] In other words, where under the statute amendments may be made as to matters of form, an amendment which would substitute a valid for a void affidavit is not allowable.[73]

Amendments for minor or formal defects in affidavits or applications for attachment have been permitted under the statutes applicable to amendments generally providing, in terms or effect, for amendment to any pleading, process, or proceeding in the discretion of the court and in the furtherance of justice, and requiring courts to disregard unsubstantial defects in any proceeding,[74] and it has been held that defects of substance can be cured by amendment under such statutes.[75] On the other hand it has been held that such a statute providing for amendments generally does not apply to amendments to attachment affidavits, at least where the defect sought to be cured thereby involves a jurisdictional allegation.[76] Also, notwithstanding the general statute granting the court power to permit amendment of any pleading or proceeding, a statute, providing that defendant may apply on motion, after reasonable notice, to have the writ of attachment discharged on the ground that it was improperly or irregularly issued, and providing that, if the motion is made on affidavits on the part of defendant, but not otherwise, plaintiff may oppose the same by affidavits or other evidence, has been held to limit and control the general statute, and where the application to discharge the attachment was not made on affidavits, plaintiff could not amend a defective affidavit for attachment.[77]

Where the writ was issued on a paper which as an affidavit was a nullity, and where an affidavit is essential to the issuance of a writ of attachment, the writ cannot be vitalized by the filing of an affidavit amending the purported affidavit which as an affidavit never existed.[78] Unless the affidavit is a nullity, however, it is amendable under a statute providing that an attachment shall not be discharged if at or before the hearing of an application for its discharge the affidavit on which it was based shall be amended and made to conform to the statute.[79]

Matter which is properly alleged in the original affidavit, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, need not be repeated in the amended affidavit.[80]

In Georgia, since the acts of 1887 and 1889, codified in Civ Code (1910) § 5706, authorizing amendments of affidavits which are the foundation of legal proceedings, an attachment affidavit is amendable both in form and substance, if there is enough to amend by, the same as other pleadings—Harmon v. On motion to vacate

Under Code Civ Proc. § 768, providing that "whenever a motion is made to set aside or vacate an order, judgment or decree or any paper filed or proceeding taken, because of technical defects therein, or because of defects or insufficiencies in the papers or proceedings upon which it was made or entered and such defects or insufficiencies can, without prejudice to intervening rights, be cured or supplied, it shall be the duty of the court to direct upon the hearing of such motion, that such defects . . . be cured or supplied nunc pro tunc," defects or insufficiencies in attachment papers may be remedied, even when the motion to vacate the attachment is based solely on those papers, since there is no reason why an attachment should be vacated because of the omission of some allegation or proof from the papers, when in fact the allegation can truthfully be made, or the truth is in existence or can be supplied on the motion to vacate—Sorensen v. 6 C J. p 155 note 34 [b].

"A thing which is nothing cannot be amended so as to be something If the writ of attachment levied upon the property and by which it was seized was issued upon an affidavit which sought to amend which had no existence, then the writ itself was a nullity, and the court obtained no jurisdiction over the res, the property attached Jurisdiction over the subject-matter of an attachment is obtained by the levy thereon of a writ properly issued . . . A valid writ cannot be issued unless the statutory affidavit has been filed Such an affidavit is an indispensable prerequisite to the issuance of a valid attachment writ. . If the affidavit filed is indeed an affidavit, but is merely insufficient in some one or more features thereof, the statute provides that it may be amended . . But, where a writ of attachment is issued and levied without an affidavit, or (which is the same thing) upon a paper purporting to be an affidavit, but which in fact is not, the writ is void, and cannot be galvanized into life by the filing of an affidavit amending an affidavit which never existed"—First Nat. Bank of Appleton City v. Griffith, supra.

79. Corum v Superior Court in and for Alameda County, 300 P. 837, 114 Cal.App 741—Nichols v. Davis, 137 P. 41, 23 Cal App. 67

80. Schultz v. Stiner, 157 P 365, 98 Kan. 45, denying rehearing 155 P.

Of course, to cure the defect, a sufficient amendment is necessary,[81] and the person seeking the amendment must conform to the rules and requirements respecting the filing of an amended affidavit.[82] Accordingly, where plaintiff, after an affidavit for attachment was held insufficient, filed an amended petition stating that the defect occurred by mistake, but repeated the same defect, the affidavit was insufficient.[83]

Where plaintiff has once filed an amended affidavit, and chosen to stand thereon, and where the rule to dissolve the attachment has been made absolute, it has been held that he will not be permitted again to file an amended affidavit.[84]

Construction of statutes. While it has been held that a general statute providing for liberality of construction in favor of amendments of ordinary pleadings does not apply to amendments of affidavits for attachment,[85] it is generally held, frequently by virtue of express statutory provision, that statutes relating to attachment affidavits, since they are remedial in character, should be liberally construed and applied.[86]

In collateral proceedings Of course the court in a collateral proceeding cannot permit an amendment of the affidavit for attachment.[87]

Intervening rights. Attachment proceedings may not be amended so as to create a lien affecting the rights of another attaching creditor, previously legally fixed on the same property.[88]

Under a statute providing for amendments where they can be made without prejudice to intervening rights, where the rights of third persons have intervened, defects in the attachment affidavit cannot be cured by amendment.[89]

Relating back Where attachment has issued, an averment in an amendment as to a ground for attachment, where such an amendment is permissible, should relate back to the time of asking the attachment in the petition originally filed.[90]

The federal courts, under general rules stated in the title Federal Courts § 130 [25 C.J. p 816 notes 90–95], may grant amendments in attachment proceedings in cases where the state practice does not allow them and the decisions of the state courts respecting amendments are not binding on them when sitting in the same jurisdiction, although generally, as seen in Federal Courts § 126 [25 C. J. p 813 note 30–p 814 note 54], the practice in attachment conforms to that of the state courts.[91]

(2) Applications of Rule

The rules stated in the previous subsection have been applied in a variety of situations.

The rules just announced in the previous subsection have been applied in many situations which will be discussed in detail hereinafter in this section.

Venue. A failure to state the venue in the affidavit does not render the affidavit void, and the defect may be cured under statutes permitting amendments as to formal matters,[92] even after a motion to dismiss on the ground of such omission has been filed.[93]

Entitling In view of the rule already discussed in § 119 that it is not necessary that the affidavit be entitled if the designation of the cause sufficiently appears elsewhere, a defect in the title of the cause is a mere formal matter, and may be remedied by amendment,[94] as may also a misnomer of the parties in entitling the affidavit.[95]

Parties and statements about parties. A proposed change in the affidavit, which would have the effect of introducing into the cause a new plaintiff for the ones who originally instituted the action and proceeding, is of a material character, and, in the absence of statutory permission, is not allowable.[96] Where, however, such amendment is permissible under the statute, the affidavit for attachment may be amended so as to name an omitted party plaintiff,[97] or to insert the name of an additional party defendant.[98] Also, under statutes permitting the affidavit to be amended to cure any defect in form or substance, where no question of identity arises, an improper description of a party may be rectified by substituting his true name.[99]

An affidavit which gives the name of the firm of which plaintiffs are members, but which does not give the individual names of plaintiffs, has been held to be merely defective in form, and consequently subject to amendment.[1] On the other hand, under a statute permitting an affidavit for attachment to be amended to the same extent as ordinary declarations, it has been held that an amendment that the debt was due a partnership, instead of an individual as alleged in the affidavit, was improper.[2]

The naming of two or more persons as joint defendants, when in fact they are not jointly liable, has been held to be a defect of substance, and not curable by amendment.[3]

Capacity of party or affiant. An affidavit by an agent or attorney, which fails to disclose his relation to plaintiff, where necessary, is defective in form merely, and may be so amended as to show that fact.[4] Accordingly, where the original affidavit for attachment was not made by plaintiff and where it did not state that affiant made it for plaintiff, as required by statute, the defect is not jurisdictional, and the affidavit may be amended by incorporating such allegation.[5] Likewise, a receiver may amend by adding an allegation respecting his authority to sue.[6]

Under a statute authorizing an amendment if a proceeding taken by a party fails to conform to the statutory requirements, where an affidavit is made by an agent or attorney when plaintiff is in the county, and where under such circumstances the statute does not authorize an agent or attorney to make the affidavit an amended affidavit may be filed.[7]

Nature or cause of action. Where amendments to attachment affidavits are permissible under the statute as to formal matters only, an amendment which will effect a fundamental change in the cause of action as originally stated,[8] or which will substitute one cause of action for another,[9] is not proper. On the other hand, under a permissive statute, the affidavit may be amended by supplying

Use of singular where plural required

Where, in an action against three defendants, the original attachment affidavit alleged that the action was not intended to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors of the said "defendant," and was thus in this respect insufficient, an amendment changing the singular, "defendant" to the plural, "defendants" was permissible—Peterson v. Failure to allege relation of landlord and tenant

Where plaintiff in his affidavit for attachment alleged that defendant was indebted for rent and that defendant was disposing of a part of his crop without paying the landlord's lien, and failed to allege that the relationship of landlord and tenant existed and that the debt sued for was for "rent on, and advances made to assist or aid in the cultivation of, the land for the current year, as required," since such omission was one of substance, it was held that it could not be supplied by amendment. —Staggers v. Washington, 56 Ala. 225

Speed of automobile

An amendment during trial of an attachment levied on an automobile which collided with plaintiff's automobile to show that it was operated in excess of twenty miles per hour in willful violation of statute, went to the substance and not merely to the form, and was, therefore, unauthorized—Keller v Federal Bob Brannon Truck Co., 269 S W 914, 151 Tenn 427

9. Westover v. Van Dorn Iron Works Co., 97 N W 598, 70 Neb. 415—6 C J. p 157 note 57.

omitted statements as to the cause of action or the nature of the claim[10]

Where the original affidavit, although sufficient in form, was drawn on an incorrect theory of recovery, under a statute providing that no writ of attachment shall be quashed on account of any insufficiency of the affidavit, if plaintiff shall cause a legal and sufficient affidavit to be filed, an amendment stating the correct theory is permissible[11]

A failure to show in the affidavit the evidentiary facts by which plaintiff seeks to establish the cause of action alleged, as required by statute, has been held to be a formal defect which may be cured by amendment,[12] but, according to other authority, an affidavit which fails to make any statement of the material facts relied on to show the existence of the grounds for attachment, as required by statute, is void, and cannot thereafter be amended by the filing of another affidavit purporting to state the material facts[13]

Claim. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, an affidavit defective because not alleging an existing debt or demand due to plaintiff, which he is entitled to recover, is not the subject of amendment;[14] but an affidavit ambiguous because stating a present or a future indebtedness may be amended by striking out the allegation respecting the maturity of the debt in the future,[15] and such appropriate amendments may be made to an affidavit based on a debt actually due as will authorize an attachment to secure a debt not yet matured[16] or show that the debt is due in part only,[17] or that the indebtedness has become absolute pending the action.[18]

Under a permissive statute, when inadvertently omitted, the amount of the indebtedness claimed may be shown by a subsequent amendment or new affidavit,[19] or the affidavit may be amended where the allegations relative to the amount of the claim are uncertain and indefinite, or it contains erroneous statements in respect thereto, made through mistake or inadvertence.[20]

Under a statute providing that plaintiff must be permitted to amend any defect of form or substance in the affidavit for attachment, a plaintiff, who has sued out an attachment for a sum exceeding the court's jurisdiction, may amend by filing a new affidavit for a sum within the court's jurisdiction.[21]

Where the statute permits defects in attachment affidavits to be cured by amendments, a failure to state the amount affiant believes plaintiff out to recover may be cured by an amended affidavit.[22]

Under a statute providing generally for a cure of defects in attachment affidavits, a defective affidavit which fails to allege that the claim sued on is a just one, as required by statute, may be cured by an amended affidavit,[23] but under a statute allowing a supplemental affidavit to state additional facts to show the grounds of attachment, but which allows no other amendments, the omission in the affidavit of attachment that plaintiff is "justly" entitled to recover relates to plaintiff's right to recover, and cannot be cured by amendment.[24]

Security. A failure to state that the claim sued on is not secured,[25] or that, although secured, such

Amount already implicitly stated

An affidavit omitting a statement of the amount due, as required by statute, but reciting that plaintiff had begun his action on the notes and that the claim was just, due, and not paid, could be amended to state the amount of plaintiff's claim, where such matter could be inferred from what already had been expressly stated.—Schultz v. Form defective

An affidavit for attachment, containing the statement "that the payment of the same [the debt] is not secured," instead of the statutory language "has not been secured," was security has become valueless,[26] as required by statute, does not render the affidavit void, but defective in form merely, and subject to amendment.

Grounds Under some statutes, an affidavit which fails to assign any statutory ground for an attachment, is fatally defective in a matter of substance, and cannot be amended in that respect,[27] but under other statutes, which permit amendments as to matters of substance, such defects are amendable.[28]

Where permissible under the statute, an amendment which merely makes the cause of action alleged in the petition more specific is allowable to show the ground for the attachment,[29] as is also an amendment so as to allege fully matters prescribed in the disjunctive as a distinct ground of attachment, and only alleged in part in the original affidavit.[30] An amendment to an affidavit is likewise permissible for the purpose of stating a ground positively which was merely alleged on information and belief in the original affidavit.[31]

Under permissive statutes, an affidavit which is uncertain and ambiguous because stating separate grounds in the disjunctive is amendable.[32]

Under a statute providing that when an affidavit for attachment is adjudged insufficient, the attachment shall not be dissolved, if plaintiff files a good and sufficient affidavit, an affidavit charging a belief that defendant is about to remove his property may be amended by further charging a fraudulent intent,[33] or by supplying clerical omissions to state a fraudulent intention to dispose of the property and that the property belonged to the debtor.[34] Where the statute permitting amendments to pleadings generally applies to affidavits for attachment, an affidavit in the language of the statute, alleging fraudulent intent in disposing of property, may be amended by setting forth the facts relied on.[35]

An affidavit which does not substantially comply with the statutory provisions respecting the allegations as to the removal of defendant from the state or other prescribed place is defective in substance and cannot be amended, in the absence of a statute permitting amendments as to substantive matters;[36] but an allegation that the debtor is about to remove from the state may be amended by stating, in addition, a political division within the state.[37]

A failure to aver that plaintiff is in danger of losing his claim unless an attachment issue, or an allegation faulty in that respect is amendable, under a statute permitting amendments as to substantive matters.[38]

In the absence of a statute permitting amendments of attachment affidavits as to matters of substance, an amendment stating new or additional grounds proposes a matter of substance and should not be allowed.[39] Where, however, the statute per-defective, but not void, being subject to amendment.—American Surety Co of New York v. Kartowitz, 195 P 99, 59 Mont 1.

26. Corum v Superior Court in and for Alameda County, 300 P. 837, 114 Cal App 741.

Pledge valueless

Where, on motion to dissolve an attachment on the ground that the debt was secured by a pledge of accounts, the trial court adopted plaintiff's theory that a transfer of the accounts did not constitute a pledge, and plaintiff, therefore, had no occasion to amend its affidavit to state that the uncollected accounts had become valueless, it should be given an opportunity to amend after reversal of the order denying the dissolution.—Savage Tire Sales Co. v. Stuart, 203 P 364, 61 Mont. 524.

Security already applied on debt

Where plaintiff in his original affidavit for attachment stated that his claim was not secured, he could later add by amendment that his claim had originally been secured, that such security had already been applied on the claim, that such security was hence valueless, and that the present action was brought to collect the remainder of the claim.—Hetrick v Renwald, 236 P 1089, 73 Mont. 426

28. Order and judgment as amendment

Where an affidavit on which a warrant of attachment was issued was insufficient because the grounds for plaintiff's assertion were not set out in the affidavit, but the court found from the evidence offered by the parties that there was reasonable ground for the assertions in the affidavit, it was held that the court's order and judgment was in effect an amendment of the affidavit.—Thornburg v. 39. Mitchell v. Fahey, 240 P. 612, 112 Okl 251—6 C J. p 158 note 74
"An amendment of an affidavit for an attachment is proper where it will be in furtherance of justice, even on the hearing, but no new cause of attachment which existed at the beginning of the action can be assigned, as a party must state all his grounds therefor when the action is brought, and cannot bring new ones by amendment"—Brookmire v. Rosa, 51 N W. 840, 841, 34 Neb. 227.

New ground changing cause of action

mits such amendments, amendments stating new or additional grounds are proper,[40] even after the attachment has been levied, or the trial has begun on a plea traversing the original affidavit[41] On the other hand, under such statutes, it has been held proper to refuse to allow such an amendment where the attachment was originally secured on grounds which had no existence in fact,[42] or where the motion to amend was not accompanied with an offer to file an additional bond conditioned for prosecuting with effect the additional causes proposed to be set forth[43]

Nonresidence of defendant, where relied on as a ground for attachment, according to some authority, is a jurisdictional matter, and an affidavit failing to allege such nonresidence cannot be remedied by an amendment supplying the omission, unless the statute permits amendments as to matters of substance.[44] According to other authority, nonresidence, although necessary to the jurisdiction of the court, is a formal averment not affecting plaintiff's cause of action, and, consequently, an affidavit for attachment, failing to allege defendant's nonresidence in a foreign attachment, can be amended.[45] Of course, where the statute permits amendments as to substantive matters, the statement that defendant is a nonresident, if necessary for an attachment, may be added by way of amendment, where such statement is omitted from the original affidavit.[46]

Where nonresidence of defendant must be positively sworn to, the fact that the averment of nonresidence is on information and belief does not render the affidavit void, but merely voidable, and as such it is amendable.[47]

Where a failure to ascertain and state in the affidavit the place of defendant's residence, as required by statute, merely renders the affidavit voidable, under a statute permitting amendments to attachment affidavits, the defect may be cured by amendment[48]

Negation of improper motive. Failure to state that the attachment is not sued out for the purpose of vexing or harassing defendant is a substantial defect which, in the absence of a statute extending the right of amendment to matters of substance, cannot be supplied by amendment[49]

Property of defendant. An affidavit for attachment may be amended so as to make the description of defendant's property more definite,[50] or remedy a clerical error in stating the possession by the debtor of goods exempt from execution[51]

Where plaintiff in his affidavit fails to aver that the property attached in a foreign attachment suit is owned by defendant, such omission may be supplied by amendment[52]

Date. Errors in the date in an attachment affidavit are usually considered as formal defects and may ordinarily be corrected,[53] or an affidavit newly dated may be substituted for one erroneously postdated[54]

Signature. If in accordance with the rules already discussed in § 132, an affidavit which is not signed is a nullity, if there is no signature to the county to avoid service of, and that she concealed herself so that she could not be served with, a summons, and later by amendment sought to add, as a basis for an attachment, that the debt was due for rent and that defendant had removed a part of her property, it was held that the latter ground could not be added by amendment, the court saying: "It is well settled that a court should permit only such amendments as do not change a cause of action and which give to the plaintiff no rights which he did not have when the suit was instituted. Clearly the plaintiff sought by such amendment to add another ground for attachment different from the two originally laid, and there was no error of the court in refusing to consider said amendment"—Mitchell v. Fahey, 240 P. 612, 112 Okl. 251.

Amendment proper
An amendment, showing that defendants have entirely disposed of the property purchased from plaintiffs which had been purchased on fraudulent representations, and that it is out of the power of plaintiffs to recover by replevin, may properly be added to an original affidavit seeking an attachment on the ground that defendants are conveying their property with intent to defraud their creditors.—Jaffray v. affidavit, there is nothing to amend, and, consequently, the defect cannot be cured by amendment.[55] If, on the other hand, affiant's failure to affix his signature is not a fatal defect, or if under the statute amendments may be made for defects of substance, the omission may be supplied by amendment,[56] as by adding his signature to the affidavit,[57] or by filing a new affidavit properly signed.[58]

Verification. A defect in the verification, being one of form and not of substance, may be amended,[59] and if the contents of the affidavit are duly sworn to, but the officer who administered the oath neglects to add his certificate or signature, he may generally be permitted to do so nunc pro tunc.[60] Where plaintiff has observed all the statutory requirements respecting the filing and verification of the petition for attachment, the failure of the clerk to sign the certificate does not invalidate the proceeding, and the clerk may be directed to sign.[61] An insufficient or defective authentication of the certificate of an officer acting without the jurisdiction may likewise be amended,[62] as may also an affidavit in which the jurat is mistakenly postdated,[63] or an affidavit improperly sworn to before the attorney of record, who, although otherwise authorized to take an oath to the affidavit, was disqualified in the particular case because of his relationship to the parties;[64] but an affidavit taken before a person having no authority to administer the oath is an absolute nullity and cannot be validated.[65] It has also been held that a certificate of a clerk, intended as an affidavit, which fails to state that plaintiff was sworn and which omits the jurat, cannot be cured by a subsequent order in which it appears that the clerk, having been sworn, states that plaintiff did in fact make oath to the matters stated in the certificate.[66]

Approval. It has been held that an indorsement of satisfaction could not be made nunc pro tunc.[67]

b. Time for Application for Amendment

The application for an amendment of a defective affidavit for attachment must be seasonably made.

It may be stated as a general rule that application for amendment of an attachment affidavit should be seasonably made, and that laches on plaintiff's part may deprive him of the right to amend.[68] Under permissive statutory provision an attachment affidavit may be amended at any time before judgment,[69] after a plea in abatement alleging formal defects therein has been filed,[70] after a motion to dissolve or quash the attachment has been made,[71] before the time of argument on a rule to dissolve,[72] and before the affidavit is adjudged defective.[73] On the other hand, while it has been held that the affidavit might be amended on appeal,[74] it has also been held that the affidavit is not amendable

In Missouri

(1) Under Rev St (1899) § 413 (St Annot [1906], p 501), permitting an attachment to be dissolved on motion before final judgment if the supporting affidavit is insufficient, but prohibiting its dissolution if plaintiff files a sufficient affidavit in such time and manner as the court directs, plaintiff could, pending the hearing of a motion to dissolve the attachment because the affidavit was not signed, amend by signing the affidavit, or by filing a sufficient affidavit. —Marshall v Brown, 122 S W. 790, 145 Mo.App. 426.

(3) Prior to the enactment of this statute, it was held in this jurisdiction that an affidavit, which is not signed by the alleged affiant, and in which the jurat is neither signed by the clerk nor attested by the seal of the court, is a nullity, and cannot be amended.—Sedalia Third Nat Bank v Garton, 40 Mo App 113

after judgment,[75] after a plea in abatement has been sustained,[76] or after defendant has appealed from an order of the court denying his motion to dissolve the attachment on the ground of the insufficiency of the affidavit.[77]

Where, on motion to dissolve an attachment for insufficiency of the affidavit, the court is required to give plaintiff an opportunity to remedy the defects, it may order the dissolution of the attachment unless a proper affidavit is filed within a designated time,[78] which should be reasonable.[79]

c. New Verification

An amended affidavit or petition must generally be verified anew.

Where an affidavit or petition is amended in a material respect, it should be verified[80] or sworn to[81] anew, or new affidavits should be filed;[82] but, if the amendment is no more than a new statement of the same cause of action, it has been held that the petition need not be resworn to.[83]

d. Effect of Amendment

(1) In general
(2) Relation back

(1) In General

An amendment is not necessarily the beginning of a new suit or prejudicial to rights existing.

The filing of an amended affidavit setting up additional grounds for attachment is not the commencement of a new suit.[84]

An unnecessary amendment is without prejudice where the original affidavit was sufficient.[85]

(2) Relation Back

Under a permissive statute, an amendment to an affidavit may, where it does not prejudice the parties or other persons, relate back to the time of the original affidavit.

Under a permissive statute, an amendment to an affidavit for attachment may relate back and be given effect as from the time of the original affidavit.[86] Accordingly, under such a statute, where the amendment does not change the cause of action or deprive defendant of any material right, it relates back to the time of the original affidavit.[87] On the other hand, in the absence of such a statute, it has been held that the levy of an attachment based on an insufficient affidavit is not cured by an amendment of the affidavit.[88]

An amended affidavit in attachment, the material averments of which are in the present tense, and do not relate back to the time of filing the original affidavit, does not cure defects in the original affidavit.[89]

As between the creditor and the debtor the amendment of the affidavit will not affect the lien obtained under the affidavit originally made and filed.[90]

As to subsequent attaching creditors or lienors, if the amendment is one of substance or prejudice will result, liens obtained by them intermediate the original levy and the amendment will be entitled to priority, and the amended attachment affidavit must be treated as though made and filed on the day of the amendment.[91] It has been held, however, where the defect cured by the amendment is not jurisdictional, that the amendment will relate

Defendant not prejudiced

Where it was provided by statute that a plaintiff was entitled to an attachment if he showed that he had an action for damages resulting from the commission of a felony or a misdemeanor, and plaintiff in his original affidavit alleged the commission of a felony by defendant in that he set fire to plaintiff's property, and the amended affidavit alleged facts showing that defendant set fire to plaintiff's property, under circumstances making the offense a misdemeanor, such variance did not deprive defendant of any substantial right and did not prevent the amended affidavit from relating back to the original affidavit.—Robinson v. back even as to subsequent attachment creditors.[92]

Sureties on the bond are not released by a merely formal amendment or one which merely enlarges the amount claimed by the original declaration.[93]

e. Supplemental Affidavit or Complaint

Under a permissive statute, plaintiff may file a supplemental affidavit or complaint to cure defects appearing in his original papers.

Under some statutes, where plaintiff's original affidavit is free from jurisdictional defects,[94] he is permitted to file a supplemental affidavit or complaint for the purpose of correcting errors or defects or supplying omissions in the original affidavit[95] or complaint,[96] even after a motion to vacate,[97] or for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the court additional facts in respect of his right to an attachment, which were not known to him at the time of the filing of the original affidavit.[98] Accordingly it has been held that plaintiff may by means of a supplemental affidavit amplify proof with respect to the damages for a breach of contract,[99] was properly allowed, since the original affidavit was free from jurisdictional defects,[1] or otherwise allege evidentiary facts,[2] or supply deficiencies and irregularities, such as the failure to show the grounds of affiant's information and belief.[3] Where the defect in the statement of his cause of action in the original affidavit is not such as to deprive the court of jurisdiction, plaintiff may supply such defects or irregularities by means of supplemental affidavits;[4] but, where the original affidavit is defective on its face in failing to state any cause of action, thus depriving the court of jurisdiction, the defect cannot be supplied by supplementary affidavits.[5]

Time of taking effect. The supplemental affidavit is ordinarily effective as of the time of its filing.[6]

§ 144. Application in Addition to Affidavit

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, an application in addition to the affidavit for attachment is unnecessary.

In accordance with the rule already discussed in section 105 that no pleadings need accompany the affidavit unless the statute so requires, in the absence of any statutory requirements as to a written request for an attachment in addition to the affidavit, it is sufficient that a proper affidavit entitling plaintiff to an attachment be in fact made and filed, the filing of the affidavit being a sufficient request to grant the writ, and confers upon the court jurisdiction to act.[7]

C. ATTACHMENT BOND OR OTHER SECURITY

§ 145. Necessity

A failure to give an attachment bond as required by statute is fatal.

Where a statute authorizing attachment requires, as a condition to the issuance of the writ, that a bond shall be given by plaintiff to indemnify defendant for any loss or injury resulting from the attachment in case it proves to be wrongful, a failure to give such bond is fatal,[8] and an attachment issued without the necessary bond is invalid.[9] Under some statutes, the giving of a bond is a jurisdictional requirement, which cannot be dispensed with, as jurisdiction does not attach until the bond is given.[10] Under other statutes, the bond is not a jurisdictional prerequisite, and the failure to give the attachment bond is a mere irregularity of which defendant alone can take advantage, the attachment being otherwise valid.[11] In the absence of statutory permission, where the statute requires a bond as a condition to the issuance of attachment, a court of equity has no general jurisdiction to order an attachment without bond.[12]

A statute providing that, where defendant in attachment makes an affidavit of substantial defense and, where plaintiff fails to give bond to prosecute the attachment with diligence, the attachment shall stand dismissed ipso facto is mandatory, and, on failure of plaintiff to give such bond, the attachment stands dismissed without any affirmative action of the court.[13]

In view of the fact that attachment is a statutory remedy, the court will not demand that plaintiff do more than the statute requires, and, where the statute does not require an attachment bond in the particular case, no bond need be given.[14] Accordingly, under the statutes in force at the time and in the place where the question arose, a bond has been held unnecessary in case of a branch writ to another county,[15] an attachment against a foreign corporation or a nonresident,[16] an attachment in favor of the United States,[17] a state, or a city or county[18] or an official thereof,[19] an attachment on a claim for liquidated damages;[20] where plaintiff takes a pauper oath in lieu of giving a bond,[21] or where the officer is not directed to take the property into his actual possession.[22] However, a statute authorizing a litigant to prosecute an action without payment of costs does not excuse the litigant from furnishing an attachment bond.[23]

Under some statutes, the addition by amendment of a new party defendant to an attachment proceeding necessitates the giving of a new bond.[24]

In Kentucky

(1) Under the statute of 1838–1839 (Sess.Acts 259), as well as the act of 1796 (1 Digest 159–160), directing the justice before granting an attachment to take bond and security from the attaching creditor, and declaring that "every attachment issued without such bond taken, or where no bond shall be returned," shall be illegal and void, and shall be dismissed," the word "void" has been held to be used incautiously and intended only to mean voidable.—Banta v. Reynolds, 3 B.Mon. 80.

(2) It has also been held in this jurisdiction that the want of a bond renders an attachment voidable, if not void.—Farmers Nat. Bank v. Lancaster Nat. Bank, 4 Ky.L. 451.

Statute construed

A statute, providing that no undertaking in attachment shall be required where the "party or parties defendant" are all nonresidents of the state or a foreign corporation, is applicable where the party or parties against whom an order of attachment is issued are nonresidents, and does not require all of the parties defendant in the principal action to be nonresidents.—Broach v. Statute waiving security for costs

A city was not entitled, under a law providing that no security for costs should be required of any incorporated city or town, to issuance of a writ of attachment without filing an attachment bond.—City of Munday v. First State Bank of Munday, (Tex.Civ.App.) 66 S.W.(2d) 775.

24. Ill.—Baldwin v. Ferguson, 35 Ill. App. 393.
Pa.—Stein v. Bowers, 2 Wkly.N.C. 542.

Return and filing Where it is the legislative intent that the bond shall be returned and filed by the officer issuing the attachment at the return of the writ, since plaintiff is not charged with the custody of the bond, a failure of the officer to file the bond at the return of the writ is not fatal to the attachment, at least where no injury results to defendant because of such neglect.[25] Likewise, in view of a statute providing that the attachment law is to be construed "in the most liberal manner, for the advancement of justice and the benefit of creditors," although the statute requires the bond of the creditor to be taken and returned with the writ to the court, it does not embrace the case of the accidental destruction of such bond before its return, and the attachment will not, on proof of accidental destruction of the bond, be quashed for want of the bond taken and returned as required by the statute [26]

Use under another writ. If the original writ of attachment is lost and plaintiff, instead of procuring a duplicate, secures another writ and has the property seized again, a new bond is required, and the original bond cannot be used in the second proceeding [27] However, as discussed infra § 200, where the new writ is a substituted or an alias writ to cure a defect in the original writ or levy, it is not regarded as a new proceeding, and, therefore, no new bond is required.

Undertaking. Where the statute so permits, an undertaking instead of a bond may be filed [28] Where the statute requires a bond, however, an undertaking is not sufficient.[29]

§ 146. Time for Giving

The bond should be given within the time prescribed by statute, which frequently is before the issuance of the writ.

Since attachment is a statutory remedy, there must be a compliance with the statutory requirements as to the time of giving the attachment bond. Thus, where, under the statute, the giving of the bond is a condition precedent to the issuance of the writ,[30] until the giving of the bond jurisdiction does not attach, and the bond or undertaking must precede the issuance of the writ.[31] A marginal note upon the writ by the judge issuing it, that it shall not be levied until a sufficient bond is filed,[32] or a filing nunc pro tunc,[33] is insufficient to save the validity of the attachment under such statutes In the absence of a statute requiring the giving of bond before the issuance of attachment, however, it is not a prerequisite to its issuance [34] Also, under some statutes, the issuance of an attachment before a bond is given, if it is a defect, may be cured by the giving of a sufficient bond,[35] and, under a statute so providing, an attachment will not be dismissed if plaintiff, his agent, or attorney is willing to give bond, and does so within due time.[36]

Under a statute providing that, should defendant make an unqualified appearance in the cause, it is the duty of the clerk to issue notice to plaintiff of such fact and that, unless within five days after service of such notice plaintiff makes suitable bond, the levy shall be discharged, in the absence of the issuance and service of the prescribed notice, there is no basis for a contention that a failure to give bond, although plaintiff had knowledge of the unconditional appearance, ipso facto discharged the levy.[37]

Where the bond and the writ bear the same date it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the bond preceded the writ.[38] Also, a recital in the bond that plaintiffs "have this day sued out an attachment" has been held to be intended to identify the case in which the bond was given and not to indicate the order, in point of time, in the proceedings, and consequently not to render the attachment invalid as issued before bond was filed [39] Likewise, where the bond recited that plaintiff "hath on this day sued out" a writ of attachment, the court could construe the writ and the bond together, and, where the date of the writ showed that it was issued after the bond was filed, the attachment was valid, notwithstanding the recital in the bond.[40] On the other hand, it has been held that an attachment was fatally defective where the attachment and bond were dated on the same day and the bond recited that on that day plaintiff had first issued or obtained the attachment.[41]

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the fact that the undertaking was executed prior to the date on which the complaint was filed does not render the attachment void.[42]

§ 147. Form and Requisites

An attachment bond should conform, at least substantially, to statutory requirements as to its form and contents.

A statute requiring an attachment bond necessarily describes the kind of bond required in many of its particulars It should be consulted and closely followed,[43] and a failure to comply with its requirements is fatal to the attachment,[44] unless the omission or departure is only as to a requirement which is not jurisdictional or mandatory, and, therefore, constitutes a mere irregularity which may be cured or waived.[45]

A substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute is sufficient to uphold the bond, even though the exact words of the statute are not followed;[46] and mere clerical errors are not fatal, but may be disregarded or corrected where it is apparent that the purpose of the statute has been substantially fulfilled.[47]

The sufficiency of an attachment bond is not to be tested by whether the surety might eventually be held liable, but whether the precedent conditions prescribed by law, and without which the attachment cannot stand, have been fulfilled.[48]

The statutory form, where one is prescribed, should be followed, because it is always sufficient,[49] and it is sometimes regarded as not only correct but necessary to pursue the form given by the statute.[50] No recital which is not plainly required by the statute need be inserted,[51] although a recital beyond the statutory requirement may not render the bond or undertaking void.[52]

Aside from the statutory requirements no particular form of bond need be followed, but it is sufficient if the intention to become bound in the manner and to the extent required be adequately expressed.[53] Accordingly it has been held not a sufficient ground of objection that the bond contains interlineations and erasures,[54] that the condition

Statute not impliedly repealed

A statute providing the general requirements of attachment bonds is not repealed by a subsequent statute relating to fiduciaries therein described, which description is followed by an "in general" clause, under the familiar rule of construction that, where there is in the same statute a particular enactment, and also a general one which, in its most comprehensive sense, would include what is embraced in the former, the particular enactment must be operative, and the general enactment must be taken to affect only such cases within its general language as are not within the provisions of the particular enactment.—Tri-State Motor Corporation v Standard Steel Car Co., 51 App D C 109, 276 F 631.

Bond held sufficient

The expression in an attachment bond "conditioned that plaintiffs prosecute their said suit to effect" is the legal equivalent of the statutory expression "conditioned that plaintiffs will prosecute their suit to effect"—Laird v. Williams & Chastain, (Tex Civ App) 13 S W (2d) 944.

Usual rule not applicable

"The principle that judicial bonds are to be construed by the law under which they are given, rejecting surplusage and supplying omissions, does not apply to such a case where the question is not as to the eventual liability of parties to such bonds after they have accomplished their purpose, but whether the conditions precedent prescribed by law and essential to the maintenance of the attachment have been strictly complied with Such compliance cannot be eked out by presumptions and implications or by collateral evidence"—Lehman v Broussard, 12 So. 504, 45 La Ann 346

is written below the signatures of the obligors,[55] that matters of inducement are misrecited,[56] that the place of execution is omitted,[57] or that the name of a surety,[58] or of the principal,[59] or of one of them, is omitted from the body of the bond[60]

The bond is fatally defective if its terms are not such as to show an intention to become bound according to the statute and on account of the issue and levy of the particular attachment,[61] as where the description is of a court other than the one where the proceedings are had,[62] or of parties other than the parties to the suit pending in which the attachment is sought,[63] or where the bond is signed in blank.[64]

While an attachment bond should contain recitals which unmistakably identify it with the other proceedings in the suit,[65] in the absence of a statute making such a recital mandatory, it has been held that a failure to describe the proceedings[66] or the property to be attached[67] in the bond is not fatal

Where there are two or more plaintiffs, the plural form should be used in expressing the conditions of the bond,[68] and it has been held that a bond by joint plaintiffs conditioned that "he" will pay all such damages and costs as shall be adjudged against "him" if the attachment sued out by "him" shall prove wrongful will not support a joint attachment[69]

Under a practice of referring to the specific statute under which a bond is given, in view of the rule in respect of the operation and effect of amendments to statutes, as discussed in the title Statutes § 384 [59 C.J. p 1097 note 26], that the amendment becomes a part of the original statute as if it had always been contained therein, a reference to the general statute is sufficient without specific reference to existing amendments.[70] Where a bond recites that it is given under a certain statute, which statute relates to justices' courts, whereas the cause is pending in a district court and the bond is entitled as of such court and filed therein, the defect is not fatal, but the bond is subject to amendment[71]

Caption. A bond for an attachment need not state in the caption the county where executed,[72] nor is it fatally defective because it omits from the caption the name of one of several defendants.[73]

Date. Unless required by statute, a failure to date the bond will not be fatal to its sufficiency,[74] since the bond takes effect from the date of its filing[75]

Naming court. The bond should name the court in which the suit is brought;[76] but an omission in this respect has been held not to be a fatal defect.[77] Likewise, a misrecital as to the term of the court to which the attachment is returnable is not fatal to the attachment, particularly where it is provided that the statute is to be most liberally construed for the benefit of creditors.[78]

A bond to procure an attachment may be upheld as a voluntary common-law obligation, although the statute has not been complied with, and it will be enforced on condition broken according to its terms, if it is not contrary to an express statute or to public policy or morality, has not been exacted without authority of law, and is not otherwise of such a character or form as to be utterly void,[79] if it is not contrary to an express statute or to public policy or morality,[80] and is not otherwise of such a character or form as to be utterly void[81] This rule applies to afford security to the extent of the injury done, although the attachment has been discharged because of the defect in the bond[82]

§ 149. Amount

a. Amount fixed by statute
b. Stating amount in bond

a. Amount Fixed by Statute

The penalty of an attachment bond should be in the amount required by statute.

The amount of the bond is usually regulated by statute, and, where it is so fixed as, for example, with reference to the amount of the claim or the value of the property attached, an attachment cannot be supported by a bond in a less sum than that designated in the statute requiring it,[83] although a bond supported by an amount greater than that required by statute is unobjectionable.[84] It is frequently held under the statutes, however, that the court obtains jurisdiction of the cause notwithstanding the amount of the bond is insufficient,[85] and that the defect may be cured by amendment, as will be considered in section 159, or by the filing of new or additional security, as will be discussed in section 161. It has also been held that a judgment in an attachment suit is not rendered void where the penalty of the bond is insufficient[86]

Where the statute prescribes the amount in which the bond must be made, it is not within the discretion of the court to permit the filing of a bond for a smaller amount.[87] Where, however, the statute so provides, the amount of the bond lies within the discretion of the court,[88] or of the clerk of the court,[89] sometimes within certain fixed limits,[90] and, where the amount of the bond has been fixed by the clerk in his discretion, any insufficiency in amount will not be ground for discharging the attachment.[91]

When debt not due

(1) Where plaintiff, in an action to recover a debt not due, with an attachment on real estate, did not give an undertaking conditioned in three times the amount of the demand, defendants' motion to vacate the judgment for plaintiff and pending proceedings to enforce it was properly granted —I L. Lamm Co v. Peaks, 156 N W 194, 162 Wis. 289.

(2) An attachment creditor cannot claim that by disaffirming an express contract of sale of goods on sixty days' time, which had not elapsed, induced by the false representations of the buyer, the demand was converted into a claim ex delicto, and that he has waived the tort, and sues on an implied contract for money due, so as to evade a statute providing that, where the debt is not due, the attachment bond shall be conditioned at three times the amount demanded —Lederer v. Case transferred to equity

In actions against a nonresident on judgments rendered in another state, in which attachments were issued against land within the state alleged to have been transferred to defendant's niece to defeat creditors, and in which the niece intervened and the causes were transferred to the chancery court, where they were tried as suits to recover a secret trust to defraud creditors, and lis pendens notices were filed, the fact that the attachment bonds were not conditioned as required by statute, did not defeat the jurisdiction of the court — Hurley v. In Idaho, "this court has held that the clerk has a large discretion in fixing the amount of the undertaking, and advises that the amount so fixed should not be less than the amount of the claim sued for."—Gordon v Kerr, 21 P (2d) 930, 931—6 C. J. p 167 note 10 [a] (2)

91. Gordon v. Kerr, supra.

Rule stated

"As long as the undertaking provides the conditions required by the statute, the mere fact that it does not provide a penalty equal to the claim sued for is not a ground for discharging the attachment. Had the Legislature intended that to authorize an attachment a bond should be given for a specific sum, it would have so provided."—Ross v. Gold Ridge Mining Co., 95 P. 821, 825, 14

Where the statute requires a bond sufficient to indemnify defendant for any loss sustained by wrongful attachment, it has been held that the mere fact that it is given for a sum certain will not invalidate the attachment where the penalty is apparently ample, and defendant advances no proof that the amount is insufficient,[92] but there is also authority to the effect that such attachment, and bond therefor, is absolutely void[93]

Under a statute providing that the order of attachment shall not issue until a bond has been executed to the effect that plaintiff pay to defendant all damages which he may sustain by reason of the attachment, if the order be wrongfully obtained, not exceeding double the amount of plaintiff's claim, a bond for a sum less than double the amount claimed is sufficient, provided it is in a sum large enough to secure defendant from loss[94]

Under a statute providing that plaintiff must file a bond in a penalty at least double the value of the property sought to be attached, and where the statute also requires the sheriff to levy a writ of attachment on property fifty per cent greater in value than the amount stated in the petition under oath to be due, the amount for which the bond should be given is three times the sum alleged in the petition to be due.[95]

Costs, attorney's fees and interest. Where attorney's fees are included in the amount claimed, and are recoverable, they cannot be omitted in determining the amount of the bond, where the amount of the bond is fixed, under the statute, with reference to the amount claimed[96] Where, however, the petition prays for attorney's fees, which could not be lawfully included in the suit, a bond computed on the amount claimed, excluding such fees, is sufficient.[97]

It has also been held that defendant's attorney's fees in defending the action should be included in the bond given by plaintiff in attachment to secure defendant from loss in the event plaintiff fails to recover.[98]

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, costs of the suit which may accrue on plaintiff's claim during litigation are not to be considered in fixing the amount of a bond in an attachment proceeding before judgment[99]

Under statutes fixing the amount of the bond by reference to the amount claimed to be due, if a sum is stated to be due besides interest, leaving the amount due as interest to be ascertained in the future, bond need not be given for the amount which might be found to be due as interest.[1] If, however, interest is included in the sum claimed to be due, under such statutes, bond must be given for the amount claimed as interest as well as for the amount claimed as the principal sum.[2] Where the bond is insufficient to cover interest, it has been held that the attachment will be upheld only as to the principal[3] Interest to accrue in the future should not be considered in determining the amount of the bond or undertaking, as the amount of such interest cannot be definitely determined.[4] A miscalculation in the amount of interest due, so that the bond lacks a trifle of being in the amount required by the statute, has been held not to be fatal[5]

Minor deficiencies. While it has been held, since the issuance of the writ is an ex parte proceeding, that small deviations in the bond from the amount required by the statute are fatal,[6] and while the maxim, De minimis non curat lex, must be restricted to deficiencies too insignificant for consideration,[7] minor deficiencies in the amount of the

(2) A deficiency of seventeen dollars and ten cents in a bond for seven thousand, two hundred and sixty dollars and five cents is not insignificant, and the rule of de minimis will not cure such defect in the bond—

bond or undertaking, which are insignificant when compared with the amount for which it is given, may be disregarded under the maxim.[8] Even if the maxim, De minimis non curat lex, is not applicable to a slight deficiency in the bond, such a case falls within the purview of a statute providing that a substantial compliance shall be sufficient in applications for attachment.[9]

Partnership property. Where partnership property is attached for the debt of a partner, under a statute requiring the bond to be in double the value of the property attached, the penalty of the bond may be based on the value of defendant's interest rather than the value of the property.[10]

Showing as to amount claimed. The bond need not recite the amount claimed, so as to show that it is given in a sufficient amount with reference to the sum claimed according to the statute,[11] and a misrecital of the amount will not invalidate the bond, if the true amount, as alleged in the affidavit, shows the bond to be in the proper amount.[12]

Subsequent statutes. It is obvious that a bond, sufficient in amount when executed, will not be rendered insufficient by a subsequent statute increasing the amount required before an attachment will issue.[13]

Remittitur. An attachment bond insufficient in amount cannot be made good by a subsequent remittitur of a part of plaintiff's claim.[14]

b. Stating Amount in Bond

Ordinarily an attachment bond should state the amount of the penalty thereof.

Ordinarily the bond must state the amount of the penalty, and several courts have considered that a bond in which no amount is stated is fatally defective.[15] On the other hand, it has also been held that an attachment undertaking conditioned that plaintiff would pay all costs which might be awarded to defendant, and all damages which he might sustain by reason of such attachment, leaving the amount of the penalty blank, and containing all other conditions required by law, was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, and sustain the attachment, since, by the failure to fix the maximum amount for which the sureties were to be liable in the undertaking, they bound themselves in an unlimited amount.[16]

§ 150. Conditions

An attachment bond should contain the statutory conditions.

The purpose of a statute requiring an attachment bond is to give security to the attachment debtor, on which recovery may be had in the event damages are sustained by reason of the attachment.[17] Since attachment is a statutory proceeding, the bond should contain the statutory conditions.[18] A condition, "to prosecute with effect," means to prosecute with diligence according to law.[19] A condition duly to prosecute the proceedings in attachment is simply a condition to prosecute the attachment proceedings to a final judgment. Such a condition is not the same as a condition to prosecute without delay or diligently to prosecute.[20]

The sureties' liability on the conditions in the bond will be hereinafter considered in section 163.

§ 151. Obligee

The bond should be payable to the person designated by statute.

The bond must run to the obligee designated by the statute.[21] Ordinarily the bond should be made payable to the person whose property is sought to be attached, that is, defendant,[22] and, where the statute requires that it must be made payable to defendant, a failure to name defendant[23] or describe him as defendant,[24] has been held to be fatal. On the other hand, under a statute requiring a bond payable to defendant, a designation of one defendant solely by the phrase "et al." was held to bind the obligor to such defendant in an action on the bond,[25] and a designation of defendant in the bond as "deft." was sufficient.[26]

Where there are several defendants, but the property of one only is attached, a bond to such defendant alone is proper and sufficient,[27] although it has also been held that, where all the defendants are jointly interested, the bond may be given to all, although the property of one only is attached.[28]

Where the attachment is against a partnership, the bond should be given to all the members of the firm and not merely to one,[29] but should not run to the firm in the firm name.[30]

Where the statute does not require the bond or undertaking to run to defendant, a bond given to the state instead of defendant is sufficient,[31] and, under a statute requiring a bond running to the state for the use of the owners of the property attached, if the state is made obligee, the owners need not be named or referred to in the bond.[32]

Where the bond is to be made payable to the clerk of the court, a bond made payable to the clerk, naming him, and his successors in office is sufficient, and the bond is not invalidated by the fact that the clerk named has ceased to be clerk and has been succeeded by another.[33]

§ 152. Obligor

The bond must be sufficiently definite to designate the obligor.

Although the obligor should properly be named in the bond, a designation of him as "plff," instead of inserting his name, has been held sufficient.[34]

§ 153. Sureties

a. In general
b. Competency
c. Sufficiency

a. In General

Statutory requirements in regard to the sureties on the bond must be met.

Where statutes require that an attachment bond be entered into with one or more sufficient sureties, on failure of the sureties to become parties to and sign the same the bond is rendered insufficient,[35] but the name of the surety need not appear in the body of the bond where he has signed it.[36]

Joint obligation. An attachment bond is sufficient, although the sureties signed as joint, and not as joint and several, obligors, where the statute does not specifically require that the obligation shall be several.[37]

Number. If the statute does not specify any number of sureties, a single surety, whose solvency and material possessions are satisfactory, is sufficient;[38] but, if the statute requires a specified number of sureties, less than that number will not support an attachment, no matter how responsible those executing the bond may be.[39]

b. Competency

Any person is competent as a surety who is legally able to enter into a binding contract of suretyship with the parties to the attachment bond.

Any person may be surety on an attachment bond who possesses the capacity to contract and who is not otherwise disqualified from becoming such surety by statute or rule of court[40] or by the fact that he is already bound as principal.[41] An officer of the corporation is a competent surety on the corporation's attachment bond,[42] but, where a partnership is principal on an attachment bond, a member of the partnership is incompetent as a surety thereon.[43] Under a statute requiring a written undertaking on the part of plaintiff with sufficient sureties, it is essential that some person or persons other than plaintiff shall join as surety or sureties, and an undertaking signed only by plaintiff is insufficient.[44]

Attorney as surety. In accordance with the general rules governing the disabilities of an attorney, as discussed in the title Attorney and Client § 45, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, an attorney at law may properly become a surety on his client's attachment bond.[45] It has also been held that an attachment bond, although signed by an attorney at law as security, when the statute prohibits an attorney from becoming a surety, is valid, at least where the clerk has approved it.[46]

Residence. Where personal sureties are accepted, the officer should require that they be residents of the state, so that the court may have jurisdiction over them,[47] and, where the statute requires "good and sufficient" sureties, nonresident sureties are not competent.[48] Where the statute expressly requires resident sureties, a failure to comply therewith invalidates the bond and the proceedings regardless of the property qualifications of the nonresident surety or sureties.[49]

In the absence of a statute so requiring, the sureties need not be residents of the county in which the attachment is granted.[50]

Attacking competency It has been held that an attack on the competency of a surety, as that he is a nonresident or an attorney, at least where such defect does not appear on the face of the bond, cannot be made by motion to quash, but must be raised by a plea in abatement.[51]

c. Sufficiency

The sureties must have assets of the amount and kind required by statute.

The sureties must be possessed of available assets of a sufficient amount to satisfy the court or officer designated by statute to pass on the sufficiency of the bond that they are financially able to meet the obligation which they have assumed.[52] The solvency of the sureties is primarily for the approving officer, and, in accepting the bond, he necessarily passes on the sufficiency of the security, and the person excepting to it must show that the security is insufficient.[53] According to some authority, where there is no testimony aliunde the bond, the sufficiency of the sureties will be presumed.[54]

In the absence of a statute to the contrary a surety need not own real estate if he is otherwise competent.[55]

Collective sufficiency. Unless otherwise provided by statute it is not necessary that each surety be worth the amount of the bond, but it is sufficient that they together have property sufficient to satisfy the maximum penalty of the bond.[56]

§ 154. Execution in General

a In general
b. By agent

a. In General

The bond must be executed in the statutory manner.

statute prescribes the manner in which the bond shall be executed, the statutory procedure must be followed. Unless required by statute it is not essential that the attachment plaintiff should himself execute the bond, it being sufficient if executed by proper sureties,[57] but, when the statute requires a bond executed by plaintiff, there must be such a bond, and execution by any other person will not suffice.[58] Where the statute requires a written undertaking on the part of plaintiff, with sufficient surety, it has been held that the undertaking must be signed by plaintiff;[59] but, under a similar statute, it has also been held that a bond executed by persons other than plaintiff is sufficient, since it is not necessary that there shall be in the bond a principal obligor to whom the other persons obligating themselves in favor of defendant shall stand in the relation of sureties.[60]

A partnership may make a bond by its several members to procure an attachment sued out by one member for the firm benefit.[61]

Filing. Where the statute so requires, an attachment bond should be duly filed in the proper office. Although a statute provides that no pleading shall be considered as filed until the clerk shall make a memorandum of the date of filing in the appearance docket, since an attachment bond is not a pleading, the failure of the clerk to make a memorandum of its filing will not invalidate the attachment.[62]

In office of clerk of court. Under a statute requiring an attachment bond to be executed in the office of the clerk of court, it is no objection that the bond was signed outside the office,[63] for the word "execute" means "to complete," and completion of a bond is giving it effect by delivery; and, therefore, a bond which is delivered in the proper office is "executed" in such office for the purposes of the statute.[64]

b. By Agent

(1) In general
(2) Form of appointment
(3) Attacking authority

(1) In General

Under a permissive statute the bond may be executed by an attorney or agent.

Under a statute providing that a justice, before granting an attachment, shall take bond and security of the party for whom it shall be issued, it has been held that a bond executed by an agent or attorney as obligor to pay costs and damages if judgment shall be awarded defendant is insufficient, and that the obligor should be the creditor or plaintiff in attachment.[65] Of course, under a statute authorizing a bond to be executed by the attaching creditor, his agent or attorney, a bond in which an agent or attorney is the obligor is sufficient.[66] It is, however, necessary that the person assuming to execute the bond shall have authority from plaintiff to act as his agent,[67] although plaintiff may accept and ratify the bond of an unauthorized agent or other person whenever such bond is not jurisdictional,[68] at least before the issuance of the writ.[69]

Where an agent may execute the bond for his principal, and where the attachment affidavit shows that affiant is plaintiff's agent, his signature of plaintiff's name on the bond "per" or "by" affiant, without any descriptive word as to agency, has been held to be a sufficient execution of the bond.[70]

It is the duty of a magistrate issuing a warrant of attachment to ascertain the authority of the agent executing a corporate attachment bond.[71] However, the agent need not file evidence of his authority to execute a bond,[72] unless the officer issuing the attachment requires proof of authority,[73] or until the bond is attacked by a proper plea or motion.[74]

(2) Form of Appointment

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the authority of an agent to execute an attachment bond in the name of his principal must be under seal.

In accordance with the general rule discussed in the title Agency § 27 d (1), that, in order that an instrument under seal may be validly executed by an agent, the agent's authority must have been conferred on him by an instrument of equal dignity, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, a power of attorney under seal is required to authorize an agent to execute an attachment bond in the name of his principal.[75] However, a bond executed by an agent for the obligor, where the agent's authority is not shown to be under seal, although defective, has been held not to be a nullity,[76] and, where an undertaking in attachment need not be under seal, the name of attachment plaintiffs may be signed thereto by agents; and an undertaking so signed under authority of telegrams, which are attached thereto, is sufficient.[77] Under a statute requiring that the bond be executed by plaintiff or some one on his behalf, it has been held that the authority of the agent to execute it in the name of plaintiff need not be under seal, but may be made orally.[78]

Under a statute requiring an attachment bond executed by plaintiff or his agent, where the bond is not in plaintiff's name, but is the personal obligation of his agent, no power under seal authorizing its execution by the agent need be shown.[79]

Form of ratification. The ratification of the execution of an attachment bond by an agent should, in some jurisdictions, be under seal.[80]

(3) Attacking Authority

The authority of an agent to execute an attachment bond is presumed unless it is properly questioned.

The authority of an agent to execute an attachment bond will be presumed where it has not been denied or questioned by a proper plea.[81] Where defendant desires to attack the authority of the agent to execute such bond, he should file a plea in abatement,[82] but, where such authority is attacked for failure to file the evidence of his authority, this objection is overcome by filing his power of attorney.[83]

§ 155. Signing and Sealing

a. In general
b. Sealing

a. In General

The attachment bond must be signed by the obligor or by one qualified to act for him.

The signing of the attachment bond is one step in its execution,[84] and the parties who must execute the bond, as discussed in the previous section, must sign it,[85] although the fact that the surety by mistake signed his name to the justification instead of to the undertaking itself has been held to be immaterial.[86] It may be signed in the partnership name where it appears that the obligor is the partnership.[87] The signature of a corporation may be sufficient, although typewritten, and it is no objection that the corporate name alone appears without that of the executing agent.[88]

b. Sealing

In the absence of a statute abolishing the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments, a seal is necessary to the validity of an attachment bond.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the attachment bond should be under seal in order to be valid[89] However, the usual liberality respecting the character of the seal is applicable to attachment bonds, and a mere scroll has been held sufficient,[90] as has the word "[seal]" printed on the bond,[91] and the use of one seal or scrawl by two persons.[92]

Where the only way an attachment bond can legally show that it is executed by, or is the bond of, a corporation is by the corporate seal appearing on the bond, a private seal affixed by the agent is insufficient.[93]

The time of the sealing of the bond, if it is done before delivery, is immaterial, and the seal upon an attachment bond is none the less the seal of one who executes it whether he affixes it before or after his signature, or whether he adopts as his seal one which has been already affixed to the instrument by another, or is affixed to it at his request by another after the signature has been made.[94]

On the other hand, a statute providing that no scroll or private seal shall be necessary to the validity of any contract, bond, or conveyance has been held to be applicable to attachment bonds,[95] and, under a statute abolishing the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments, the signature of the firm name of a partnership to an attachment bond, although followed by a private seal, is binding on the firm.[96]

Where the statute requires an attachment plaintiff to give an undertaking, since, as defined in section 1 of the title Undertakings [65 C.J. p 1212 note 1], an undertaking is a promise in writing not under seal, of course a seal is unnecessary.[97]

§ 156. Attestation and Acknowledgment

An attachment bond need not be attested unless this is required by statute.

An attachment bond need not be attested unless required by the statute,[98] and a rule of court requiring attestation, when the statute did not require it, has been held to be invalid as inconsistent with the statute[99] Although attestation by a magistrate be required by the statute, this need not be by the one issuing the writ.[1]

§ 157. Justification of Sureties

Where the sureties on an attachment bond are required to justify, they must do so, or the attachment will be vacated.

Where the sureties are required by statute to justify, a failure to comply will be a ground for avoidance of the attachment.[2] Where justification is required as an element of jurisdiction, a failure to comply cannot be cured;[3] but where the requirement is directory merely and not mandatory, a failure to comply is regarded as a mere irregularity which may subsequently be cured[4] or waived by failure to object in due time, as stated infra § 160.

In some jurisdictions, a defendant who desires to object to the sufficiency of sureties on an attachment bond must except to their sufficiency, after which they must justify[5]

Under a permissive statute, where the original sureties fail to justify, but other sureties are offered in due time, they must be accepted and permitted to justify.[6]

§ 158. Approval

Where the statute requires the bond to be approved, approval is necessary, although, in the absence of a statute requiring the indorsement of approval on the bond, the receiving and filing of the bond by the official whose approval is necessary may imply his approval of it.

The officer issuing the writ is generally required first to approve and accept the bond,[7] and the writ may be avoided for failure so to approve.[8] The approving officer need not, however, in the absence of a statutory requirement to that effect, indorse on the bond his approval in writing,[9] as the existence of the fact is sufficient, and this is evinced by the mere receiving and filing of the bond and issuing the writ.[10]

Where the statute requires the clerk to indorse his approval on the bond, his failure to do so is at most an irregularity, and the indorsement of approval is only evidence of approval, but not the only evidence; and if the clerk receives the bond and issues the writ it amounts to an approval so far as defendant is concerned.[11] Under such circumstances the court may, on determining the fact, direct the indorsement to be made nunc pro tunc.[12]

§ 159. Amendment of Insufficient Bond

a. In general
b. Time for amendment
c. Mode of amendment
d. Effect of amendment

a. In General

In the absence of a statute permitting an attachment bond to be amended as to matters of substance, amendments may be made as to formal matters only.

Since attachment is a statutory proceeding, where the statute requires a sufficient bond or undertaking as a condition precedent to the issuance of the writ, the giving of a sufficient bond is jurisdictional and amendments as to matters of substance are not permissible in the absence of statutory permission.[13] Where, however, the statute grants the right of amendment, the attachment bond or undertaking may be amended;[14] and statutes granting the right to amend, being remedial in character, should receive a liberal construction.[15] A statute permitting amendments to "all papers in attachment proceedings," has been held to be sufficiently broad to permit amendments to attachment bonds.[16]

In the absence of a statute extending the right of amendment to matters of substance, amendments may be made as to formal matters only, and not as to jurisdictional defects which render the bond void.[17] On the other hand, where the statute permits amendments of any defects in the bond or undertaking, matters of substance, as well as matters of form, are amendable; and under such statutes such defects cease to be jurisdictional,[18] therefore, it is sometimes said that a void bond may be amended under authority of the statute,[19] although it has also been asserted that a void bond is no bond at all, and, wherever a bond is requisite to an amendment, a void bond cannot be amended.[20]

In accordance with these rules, where the statute permits amendments to the bond or undertaking, defects consisting of an omission of the name of defendant in the caption,[21] a recitation that it was given under an improper statute,[22] an omission of the word "free" or "house" in the blank space before the word "holder" in the affidavit of justification of the sureties,[23] the insertion of the name of a stranger in the condition clause,[24] the inadvertent naming of the surety as obligee,[25] or a failure to secure timely approval,[26] have been held to be amendable.

Increasing amount of bond. Under permissive statutes, the court has jurisdiction and power to increase the amount of the undertaking on attachment,[27] and, where defendant complains of the lack of security, it has been held that his remedy is to move to increase the amount of the undertaking, and that a motion to dismiss the attachment therefor is improper.[28]

Supplying seal by amendment. It has been held that, where the bond is defective in being unsealed, the court should permit an amendment in that respect on motion.[29]

Necessity for motion. In jurisdictions where a plaintiff is permitted to amend a bond or file a new bond, he must make a timely motion therefor.[30]

b. Time for Amendment

Where amendment is permissible under the statute, a bond may be amended at any time before the attachment is dissolved.

Where permissible, amendments may be made before discharge of the attachment,[31] and an opportunity to amend should be allowed before discharging the attachment on account of an insufficient bond.[32] An undertaking in attachment may be amended in its formal parts at any time before judgment.[33]

A defective attachment bond cannot be amended in an appellate court;[34] but it has been held that, where a cause is reversed because of an insufficient attachment bond, it may be remanded with leave to amend.[35]

c. Mode of Amendment

A bond may be amended by striking or adding parts thereof, or by substituting a new bond.

The method of amendment may be either by correcting some formal irregularity, mistake, or omission,[36] or, as discussed in § 161, by the giving of an additional or substituted bond.

d. Effect of Amendment

The amendment of a bond takes effect ab initio.

Permitting the correction of an original bond or the substitution of a new one supposes the existence of a bond not defective in a jurisdictional respect or else dispenses with the jurisdictional element as a condition precedent. In any case, therefore, the effect of a duly authorized amendment is to validate the proceeding from its inception.[37]

§ 160. Waiver of Insufficient Bond

Defects in an attachment bond or undertaking which are not jurisdictional may be waived.

Since an attachment bond is required for the protection of defendant, the want of a sufficient bond may be waived by him,[38] unless the giving of a bond is an element of jurisdiction and the defect is such as to render the writ void.[39]

A waiver may be express, as by stipulation,[40] or may be implied from a failure to object.[41] It has, accordingly, been held that a defendant who fails to assail the validity of an attachment, and who for a consideration agrees that money in possession of a garnishee be paid into court to abide the judgment, ratifies and confirms such attachment proceedings, notwithstanding that no sureties signed the bond on which the attachment was issued.[42] An entry of a general appearance,[43] or pleading to the merits,[44] without objection to the bond, may also operate as a waiver of defects in the bond or undertaking. After judgment it is too late to object to a defective bond,[45] and a fortiori such an objection cannot be raised for the first time in an appellate court.[46]

If defendant waives the insufficiency of the bond, a stranger to the proceeding cannot object.[47]

§ 161. Additional or New Security

Under a permissive statute, plaintiff may be required and permitted to file new or additional security.

In view of the fact that an attachment is a statutory proceeding in derogation of the common law, it has been held, where the statute governing attachment bonds is silent on curing the defects therein, that the court is without power to require or accept a new bond if the first proves insufficient,[48] although it has also been held that the general statutes giving the court power to permit an amendment of a proceeding to make it conform to the requirements of the statutes concerning such procedure apply to attachment proceedings, and that under such a statute the court may permit a new or additional bond or undertaking to be filed to correct a nonjurisdictional defect in the original bond or undertaking.[49] Of course, where the statute permits the filing of a new bond or additional security, where the defect in the original bond is not regarded as one of substance, it may be cured by the filing of a new or additional bond,[50] and in such case it is the duty of the court to permit the filing of such bond,[51] as of the date tendered.[52]

A statute permitting the filing of a new bond or additional security, where defendant's objection raises the question of the insufficiency of the security given, does not, in the absence of anything further, permit the filing of additional security where the original bond or undertaking is void,[53] nor does such a statute permit the filing of a bond for the first time on defendant's objection;[54] but, if the bond or undertaking is merely voidable, and not void, additional and sufficient security may be filed.[55]

Where the statute permits the filing of a new or amendment of all papers in attachment, plaintiff has a right to, and the court must permit, the amendment, by filing a new bond, of an error in the condition which, by transposition of parties, obligates defendant to prosecute the action.—Gill v. Physicians' and Surgeons' Bldg., 138 A. 674, 153 Md. 394.

55. Benjamin v. Pardue, 162 S.E. 291, 44 Ga.App. 587.

Where infant was surety
Where plaintiff filed an attachment bond with an infant surety, it was held that, since the infant's contract was voidable but not void, the attachment bond was not void for want of surety; and, therefore, the attachment cannot be dismissed, although plaintiff may move for addiadditional bond or undertaking, if the original one be insufficient in amount, defendant may require an additional bond or undertaking,[56] and plaintiff has the right so to cure such a defect.[57] Where, however, the penalty is fixed by statute, and a deficiency therein renders the bond void, such a defect cannot be cured by an additional bond.[58] A third party claimant of the attached property cannot demand an increase of the security under a statute giving defendant, or one who has acquired a lien or interest in his property after it has been attached, the right to apply therefor.[59]

Defendant cannot require additional security where plaintiff appeals from an order dismissing his complaint.[60]

Where a declaration in attachment is amended by increasing the amount of the claim, the court must require a new or additional undertaking to cover the increased claim.[61] The same rule applies where the cause of action is altered so as to discharge the sureties.[62] Where, however, the amendment reduces the amount sued for, the sureties are not discharged, and, therefore, no new bond is required.[63]

The fact that the clerk of the court is permitted under the statute to fix the amount of the bond before issuing the writ has been held not to divest the court of power to order an increase in the amount of the security necessary, since the clerk is but an arm of the court, and his requirement cannot be considered as a judicial finding on the amount necessary.[64] Where the clerk orders a new bond with increased penalty and both parties appeal, under some statutes the judge has power to order a still greater increase in the penalty.[65] Also, an order denying a motion to increase the amount of the undertaking has been held not to constitute res judicata as to the necessity for increased security and as to the subsequent renewal of the motion based on a change in the circumstances.[66]

A plaintiff who desires to file an additional affidavit setting forth additional grounds for an attachment should offer to file therewith a new bond conditioned for the prosecuting with effect, etc., the additional cause set forth,[67] and in order to render a surety competent to testify on behalf of plaintiff, a new bond with a different surety may be substituted therefor and the original canceled prior to the accrual of liability thereon.[68]

Necessity for motion. Plaintiff, desiring to tender a new or additional bond, should move for permission to do so,[69] and where the amount of the bond is fixed by the court and defendant desires to have the security increased, his motion therefor should show why the original security is inadequate.[70]

Effect of failure to give additional bond. When the court orders that an additional security be given, failure to give such additional security may result in dismissal of the warrant of attachment,[71] or the levy may be reduced so as to bring the amount attached fairly within the penalty of the bond.[72] Such security is not an undertaking for costs, and on failure to give the additional bond, the court is not authorized perpetually to stay the prosecution of the action;[73] neither may it dismiss the main action[74]

Time for giving. New or additional security should be timely given[75] Under some statutes, this may be done at any time before a motion to dismiss the proceedings on account of such defective bond is decided.[76]

§ 162. Deposit as Security

Under a permissive statute, a cash deposit with the designated official is proper in lieu of the statutory attachment bond.

Under some statutes, plaintiff may deposit money with the officer as security for the obligation assumed, instead of giving bond.[77] In such case, a check,[78] even when certified,[79] is not acceptable under a statute requiring a deposit of lawful money of the United States equal in amount to the undertaking otherwise required. This defect is not obviated where the magistrate, on objection to the security, cashes the check and deposits the money with the clerk[80]

Where an undertaking is required, the deposit of cash in an amount equal to the penalty of the required undertaking is not an acceptable substitute for such undertaking.[81]

§ 163. Liability on Bond

a. In general
b. Construction of bond

a. In General

Liability on the bond is contractual in nature, and is ordinarily restricted to the obligations expressly assumed therein.

Liability on an attachment bond is created by, and rests on, its stipulations.[82] The obligor has a right to stand on the very terms of his contract, and his liability will not be extended beyond the fair import of the words used,[83] his liability is one not to be extended by implication, and it will not be inferred that he has agreed to do more than that which is fairly expressed in the bond,[84] except that in some jurisdictions it is held that statutory conditions omitted from the bond may be read into it[85] It is a consequence of the rule stated that the sureties can be subjected to liability on the bond only in reference to the particular writ for obtaining which it was given.[86]

Statute mandatory

"The language of section 303, enacted first in 1897, as to the character of the deposit, we regard as being mandatory. . . . The plaintiff in attachment now has one of two choices, either to give the required written undertaking, or to deposit the required sum of money He is not given the choice of depositing a check for money in lieu of the undertaking In this case, the check accepted by the magistrate turned out to be good, and it may be argued in support of the lower court's order that the defendant suffered no harm. This court, however, is bound by the statutory language, and must look not to one case alone, but to many cases that may arise in the future. Bank checks are not always collectible In the harsh remedy of attachment, used generally to assist a plaintiff in the collection of his alleged claim before the merit of his claim has been established, the courts must protect the rights of defendants as to the possession and control of their property The written undertaking or cash deposit, required by the law, is for the protection of defendants in attachment proceedings. The Legislature knew that bank checks might often be poor protection The courts should not attempt to substitute them in place of the protection the Legislature has thought necessary"—McDaniel v. Wrongful execution

Where an action of slander was begun, and defendant's property attached, he appeared, and plaintiff secured general judgment, on which execution issued, in the absence of appeal bond, and where the attached property was sold, plaintiff and his surety on the attachment bond were not liable thereon for such wrongful execution where the judgment was reversed on appeal—State ex rel and to Use of Fenn v. Conran, (Mo) 212 S.W. 869.

The recovery against the sureties on the attachment bond cannot exceed the amount for which the principal is liable,[87] or the amount to which the liability of such sureties is limited by statute.[88]

A cause of action on an attachment bond differs greatly from an action at common law for malicious or wrongful attachment, the latter being governed by the law of torts (see infra § 503), while the former is governed by the language of the bond and of the statute under which it is given.[89] Consequently, the cause of action on the bond does not depend on a showing of malice,[90] and conversely, the fact that the principal may have been guilty of wanton or malicious acts, which would support an action of tort against him, does not in itself impose a liability on the sureties.[91] So, if a statutory ground of attachment existed, there is no liability on the attachment bond for wrongful attachment merely because plaintiff knew that defendant had no property except such as was exempt.[92]

Since the surety's liability arises under his contract, and is limited by its terms and conditions, the surety by signing an attachment bond, does not become a participant in the seizure or detention of the attached property by the sheriff or liable as a trespasser for such act.[93]

Where plaintiff in attachment has not signed the bond, he cannot be held liable in an action on the bond.[94]

The right of action by third persons against the surety on the attachment bond will be hereinafter considered in § 397 of this Title.

Particular bonds. Where the bond is conditioned, in terms or effect, to pay all damages that defendant may incur by reason of a wrongful suing out of the attachment, the condition is broken and liability on the bond arises where it appears that nothing was due plaintiff when he sued out the writ,[95] or where none of the statutory grounds for attachment exist.[96] In an action against a partnership, where the attachment was dissolved as to an absent partner, and where judgment was had against the other on a partnership debt, this is conclusive as to probable cause for obtaining the attachment; it was not wrongfully obtained, and the surety cannot be held liable to the partner as to whom the attachment was dismissed.[97]

Where the bond is conditioned that the obligees shall pay to defendant all such damages as he may sustain by the wrongful or vexatious suing out of the attachment, if any of the statutory grounds for attachment exist, irrespective of the grounds alleged in the affidavit, it has been held that the attachment

Counterclaim justified

Under a bond conditioned that plaintiff will pay all damages which defendant may incur by reason of the wrongful suing out of the attachment, defendant's suit or counterclaim on an attachment bond is justified if it is made affirmatively to appear that there was nothing due plaintiff when attachment was sued out, and that he had no reasonable cause for believing anything was due.—Crom v. Henderson, 175 N.W. 983, 188 Iowa 227.

Wrongful and oppressive

Where the bond is conditioned that the surety will pay all damages which may be sustained by defendant if the proceedings of plaintiff shall be wrongful and oppressive, if defendant is not indebted, or if the statutory grounds for attachment do not exist, the attachment is wrongful and oppressive, giving rise to liability on the bond.—National Surety Co. v. Jean, (C.C.A.Tenn.) 36 F.(2d) 462, 68 A.L.R. 1326.

is not wrongfully sued out, and that there is no breach of the bond in this respect.[98] On the other hand, where the bond is conditioned that plaintiff will pay all damages defendant may incur by reason of the wrongful suing out of the attachment, if it appears that plaintiff had no reasonable grounds to believe that anything was due him, it has been held that the attachment was wrongful, giving rise to a right of action on the bond, irrespective of the fact that a statutory ground for attachment existed.[99] Where the proceedings prove to be wrongful and oppressive only in part, it has been held that this imposes no liability on the obligors on a bond conditioned that the proceedings shall not be wrongful or oppressive.[1]

Where the bond is conditioned that if defendant recover judgment, or the attachment be set aside by order of court, plaintiff will pay all costs that may be awarded defendant, and all damages which he may sustain by reason of the attachment, defendant is entitled to assess damages under the bond under two conditions, where defendant recovers judgment, or where the attachment is set aside, dissolved, or vacated.[2] The entry of a voluntary nonsuit, even though it be without prejudice, has been held to be equivalent to the dissolution, vacation, and setting aside of the attachment, as the attachment necessarily falls on the termination of the action adverse to plaintiff.[3] Where neither party received affirmative judgment and each bore his own costs in the action, the sureties were held liable under a bond conditioned to pay all costs that may be awarded defendant and all damages sustained by reason of the attachment if defendant recover judgment in the action.[4] Likewise, under a bond conditioned to pay all damages that defendant may sustain in the event plaintiff shall fail to recover in the case, the only conditions necessary to a recovery on the bond are failure on the part of plaintiff to recover in the case, and the sustaining by defendant of damages in consequence of the suing out of the attachment.[5]

In a bond conditioned to make it operative if judgment be given for defendant, "judgment given" means that a judgment is given by the court determining that plaintiff had no cause of action when the attachment was procured. It may be a judgment after trial on the merits, or it may be a judgment of dismissal. A judgment of dismissal entered pursuant to a stipulation of the parties settling and adjusting all matters in dispute between them does not give rise to liability on a bond so conditioned.[6]

A condition in an attachment bond that plaintiff will prosecute his action or suit to or with effect means with success,[7] and his failure to do so constitutes a breach of the condition.[8] Where defendant in attachment filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, the adjudication in bankruptcy, under the Bankruptcy Act, terminated the lien of the attachment, rendering further prosecution of the action impractical, and plaintiff's filing of his claim in the bankruptcy court is not such an abandonment of the attachment proceedings as to establish liability on such a bond without regard to the actual indebtedness.[9]

Under a bond given to secure payment of compensatory damages only, no cause of action arises where an attachment has been granted but no levy has been made;[10] and where the bond is conditioned to pay any damages that might be sustained by reason of the attachment, if the warrant was vacated, where there was no property within the jurisdiction on which to levy the attachment, and where defendant was a nonresident, defendant has suffered no damage on which a recovery may be had against the sureties.[11] On the other hand, where the bond secures defendant his costs and damages if he recovers judgment, the sureties on the bond are liable to defendant on his recovery of a judgment, regardless of whether or not a levy has actually been made.[12]

Prior agreement of parties. An undertaking or bond in an attachment proceeding constitutes an original and absolute contract on the part of the sureties, and liability thereon is not dependent or contingent on any agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendant prior to the issuance of the writ, and not made a part of such bond or undertaking.[13]

Election of defendant as to which bond he will sue on. If several attachments in different actions levied on the same property are all discharged, the debtor may elect to bring an action for damages against the obligors on any particular bond.[14]

Where the cause of action is assigned after the execution of an attachment bond by plaintiff and his surety, the bond goes along with the action as continuing security and the surety continues liable for the substituted plaintiff.[15]

Termination of liability. The surety's liability on the bond is not terminated by dissolution of the attachment,[16] nor is this liability avoided merely because defendant may have the right to sue for abuse of process or malicious prosecution.[17]

b. Construction of Bond

While the language of an attachment bond should be construed strictly in favor of the obligors, the obligation of the sureties should be, if possible, construed as coincident with the obligations imposed by statute.

While it has been held that the language of an attachment bond is to be construed strictly in favor of the obligors,[18] it has also been held that the obligation of the surety under the bond must be construed as being coincident with the obligations imposed by the statute, unless such a construction does violence to the language of the bond.[19]

§ 164. Rights and Remedies of Sureties

Where the surety on one attachment bond has paid the entire damages awarded, he may demand contribution from sureties on other bonds if given for the same purpose.

Where there are several bonds executed for the identical subject matter, and the surety on one of them has paid the entire damages, he has a right to exact contribution from the sureties on the other bonds; but such surety has no right of subrogation or contribution as against the sureties on a bond in error, given to continue in force the original attachment pending the determination of the proceedings in error.[20]

§ 165. Discharge of Sureties

The sureties on an attachment bond are discharged where the terms of the bond are changed, where the cause of action is altered to their prejudice, or where the claim is settled or the principal released.

In accordance with the rules governing the termination and release of a surety's liability generally, as discussed in the title Principal and Surety § 116 et seq [50 C.J. p 93 note 29 et seq], the sureties on an attachment bond are discharged where the terms of the bond are changed,[21] where there has been a material alteration of the writ of attachment after its issuance,[22] where the original action has been settled and a stipulated judgment of dismissal has been entered,[23] or where an amendment is permitted in the action in which the bond was given, increasing the liability of the sureties or changing the character of the action.[24] However, the sureties are not discharged by an amendment which does not change the original cause of the action[25] or increase their liability,[26] even though they had no notice thereof.[27]

Although a surety is ordinarily discharged by the discharge of his principal,[28] this rule does not apply where the discharge of the principal is by operation of law rather than by act of the parties.[29]

The mere fact that the attachment is subsequently discharged does not release the surety from liability under a bond conditioned to pay all damages which may be sustained by defendant if the proceedings of plaintiff shall be wrongful and oppressive.[30]

On consolidation of causes for trial, the liability of the surety will not be increased by the judgment that may be rendered, and, therefore, such consolidation will not release the surety from liability on the bond.[31]

An assignment of the cause of action and the substitution of the assignee as plaintiff has been held no defense to an action on the bond, which, it is considered, goes along with the action as continuing security.[32]

§ 166. Enforcement of Liability

As will be seen in the following sections, the liability on an attachment bond is, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, enforceable though the medium of an ordinary civil action ex contractu.

§ 167. —— Nature and Form of Remedy

For breach of an attachment bond an action ex contractu arises thereon.

Where the statute requires plaintiff in attachment to give bond conditioned to pay all damages caused by the attachment, if it is wrongfully sued out, an action may, of course, be maintained on the bond for such damages as may be occasioned by a breach of the conditions of such bond.[33] Such a suit on an attachment bond is an action ex contractu in nature.[34]

In some jurisdictions, defendant in attachment proceedings may bring a separate action on the bond, or counterclaim on the bond in the original action;[35] but in other jurisdictions the statutes contemplate that there shall be a separate and independent action on the bond, rather than a counterclaim thereon in the original proceedings, and this rule applies to interpleaders as well as to defendants in attachment.[36] Where a counterclaim is permissible, the mere fact that the attachment defendant may have other remedies, such as an action for malicious prosecution, does not defeat his right to counterclaim on the bond in the original proceedings.[37]

A recovery cannot be had under the common counts for a breach of an attachment bond, where the only obligation assumed by defendant was a conditional one.[38]

§ 168. —— Right of Action

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a right of action on an attachment bond, on breach thereof, arises only in favor of those named therein as obligees

An action on the bond will ordinarily lie only in favor of those named therein as obligees.[39]

An action on the bond cannot, it has been held, be maintained by the assignee of defendant in attachment,[40] but it has been held that the assignee may maintain an action on the bond against the principal where the assignment was made prior to the attachment.[41] Under a statute permitting suit in the name of the real party in interest, the assignee of an attachment bond may sue thereon in his own name,[42] but in such an action defendant may have the benefit of any set-off he would have had against the assignor.[43]

Officer levying attachment. Under the ordinary attachment bond conditioned for the payment of any damages which defendant in the attachment suit may suffer by reason of the attachment, if it proves to have been wrongful, it would seem clear that the officer levying the attachment can have no right of action on the bond; and a bond, conditioned to pay all damages "sustained by any person by reason of the suing out" of an attachment, has been held not to

Failure to present claim in time

Where the principal on an attachment bond is discharged by failure to present a claim against such person as administratrix within the time limited by law, such discharge of principal by operation of law will not discharge the surety—Munson v. Beck, 214 P. 708, 89 Okl 251 inure to the benefit of the officer who levied the attachment and took care of the property.[44] However, in a case where the attachment bond was conditioned for the payment of costs in case plaintiff fails to recover, it was held that the sheriff could recover thereon the expenses of keeping the attached property.[45] The right of third persons to bring action against the sureties on an attachment bond will be hereinafter considered in § 397.

Liability on the bond has already been considered in § 163.

§ 169. —— Conditions Precedent

Performance or compliance with conditions inserted in the bond is a condition precedent to bringing suit on the bond.

It is obvious that in order to impose liability on an attachment bond, there must be a compliance with, or performance of affirmative conditions inserted in the bond, in addition to the circumstances giving rise to liability on the bond, as already considered in § 163. Accordingly, under a bond conditioned that plaintiff will pay all costs and damages awarded defendant in case he recovers judgment, it has been held that a demand must be made on plaintiff for such payment before an action would lie against the sureties on the bond.[46] In the absence of a condition that plaintiff will pay on demand, or will pay any judgment that may be obtained against him, however, it is not necessary to make demand of the principal on an attachment bond before bringing action against the sureties on such bond.[47] Likewise, whether or not a judgment against plaintiff in attachment is a condition precedent to an action on the bond depends on the condition of the bond in question. If the bond is conditioned to pay such damages as may be sustained or caused by the wrongful attachment, it is not necessary that an independent action against attachment plaintiff should be first brought before suing on the bond,[48] but, if the bond is conditioned to pay such damages as may be awarded or recovered in any suit brought against attachment plaintiff, such suit is a condition precedent to any liability on the bond.[49]

Where the bond is conditioned to pay such damages as are awarded against plaintiff, a preliminary action against plaintiff in attachment has been considered necessary before an action can be brought on the bond.[50]

Where cause of action assigned after bond given. Where, after the giving of an undertaking by plaintiff in attachment, the cause of action is assigned, and the assignee substituted as plaintiff, it is not necessary that defendant, before proceeding against the surety on the undertaking for the costs, attempt to collect them from original plaintiff, the assignee having, by his substitution as plaintiff, become primarily liable therefor.[51]

Notice. It has been held that, in proceedings to collect on an attachment bond, whether by rule or by action, notice of the proceedings is necessary;[52] but service on plaintiff of a notice of the order vacating the attachment has been held not to be a condition precedent to the maintenance of a suit on the attachment bond.[53]

Assessment of damages in main action. Even though the statute authorizes the assessment of damages in the main action on the dissolution of the attachment, it is not a condition precedent to the right to bring suit on the bond that damages should be so assessed.[54]

Exhausting indemnity. An owner of property converted in attachment proceedings is not bound to exhaust his remedy by indemnification from third

Costs and damages
Where the bond is conditioned to pay all costs in the suit and such damages as shall be awarded against plaintiff "in any suit which may hereafter be brought for wrongfully suing out" the attachment, proceedings on the bond may be instituted for costs without a preliminary action against the attachment plaintiff, but no action can be brought on the bond for damages sustained by the wrongful attachment until there has been an award of damages against the attachment plaintiff—McLuckie v. Williams, 12 A. 1, 68 Md 262.

(2) It has been held in the appellate court, however, that where plaintiff in attachment was not one of the obligors on the bond, a preliminary action against him was necessary before action would lie against the sureties—Wilson v. Isom, 3 Ill.App 246.

parties before suing on the bond given to indemnify him.[55]

Obtaining possession of bond. Where a right of action has accrued on an attachment bond, attachment defendant need not ask leave of the court to claim possession of the undertaking[56] or require the clerk with whom the undertaking is filed in accordance with the statute to deliver it to him[57] before he can commence an action thereon.

Payment of damages caused by attachment. It is usually held that, where the damages claimed are for amounts which defendant in attachment must pay out by reason of the attachment, it is not necessary that he should have actually paid out such amounts before bringing an action on the bond, but the fact that he has become liable therefor is sufficient.[58]

§ 170. —— Defenses

a. In general
b Res judicata
c. Acts or statements of defendant in attachment
d Ownership of property
e Good faith and probable cause
f. Defense limited to grounds of affidavit
g Return of property or proceeds of sale
h. Other levies

a. In General

Matters which render the bond invalid, or defeat liability thereon, constitute a defense to an action on the bond.

Of course, defects or omissions in the bond or in the execution of the bond which render it unenforcible or invalid, as discussed in sections 147–158, 163, are a defense to an action on the bond. Accordingly, it is a sufficient defense to an action on an attachment bond that the bond is void,[59] that action thereon is premature,[60] or that plaintiff in attachment recovered final judgment in the attachment proceedings as distinguished from the main action.[61]

On the other hand, it has been held not a defense that other persons than plaintiff procured the undertaking to be executed without his privity,[62] that the order vacating attachment was duly appealed from, and that the appeal still remains in full force and undetermined, it not being further alleged that a stay of proceedings had been ordered, or such other facts and circumstances in connection with it as legally accomplished that result,[63] or that there was a chattel mortgage on the property.[64] Also, it is not a defense to an action on the bond that plaintiff misrepresented the legal effect of the bond,[65] nor, in an action on an undertaking in attachment, is it a defense as to damages arising from proceedings in garnishment that there was personal property attached more than sufficient to pay the debt, interest, and costs.[66] The fact that the attachment was vacated because of the negligence of the attachment plaintiff's attorneys is no defense to a suit against the sureties on the bond.[67]

Where defendant in attachment was awarded judgment to the effect that the attachment had been wrongfully sued out, in an action on the bond for damages sustained thereby, it is immaterial whether or not a claim had been interposed by a third person in the attachment suit.[68]

Compliance with unconstitutional statute It is no defense to an action for wrongful attachment that the issue and execution of a void writ of attachment was in strict compliance with a statute where such statute was unconstitutional.[69]

In actions on bonds in two suits, the recovery of the full penalty of the bond in one action does not defeat the recovery of the full penalty of the bond in another action, although the items in the bills of particulars in each case are identical, where the recovery in each case is less than the total amount claimed.[70]

Illegality of claim sued on The illegality of the claim, in aid of which the attachment was sued out and a bond given, is no defense to an action on the bond.[71]

Irregularities. Irregularities in attachment proceedings are not available as a defense in an action on the attachment bond[72] It has, accordingly, been held that it cannot be pleaded or proved as a defense that no writ of attachment had ever been sued out;[73] that no affidavit had been filed in the attachment proceeding,[74] that attachment plaintiff failed to file a new affidavit and undertaking on adding a new cause of action to the complaint;[75] that the affidavit on which the writ was issued disclosed no statutory ground for attachment;[76] that there was a misnomer of attachment defendant in process served on him;[77] that the levy was invalid,[78] or that the return thereon was invalid.[79]

It is not a defense to an action on a bond that it was not executed until after the issue of the writ, for which reason the writ was quashed,[80] that the penalty of the bond was for a slightly larger amount than required by statute,[81] or that the person executing the bond does not appear to have been the agent of attachment plaintiff.[82] It is no defense that plaintiff's first name was incorrectly stated in the condition of the bond, where it was correctly stated in the caption thereof.[83] In enforcing an attachment bond by rule, it is not necessary that the surety in response to the rule should urge that it was not a statutory bond where such fact is made to appear from the record.[84]

When the bond does not run to all persons who may be injured by the attachment, as required by statute, the surety has been held to be estopped to deny that the bond runs in favor of such persons, and to be liable to them in an action on the bond[85]

b. Res Judicata

If the attachment has previously been judicially declared wrongful, the propriety of the attachment cannot be set up as a defense to the bond; but, if a dissolution of the attachment is taken as only prima facie proof that it was wrongful, the propriety of the attachment may be raised as a defense.

Where the issue as to the rightfulness of an attachment has been decided in the main action adversely to plaintiff in attachment, he cannot, when made a defendant in an action on the attachment bond, set up as a defense that the matters stated in the affidavit were true, or that the proceedings in attachment were not wrongful;[86] but where an action on the bond is brought before the issue of the rightfulness of the attachment has been decided elsewhere, the defense may properly be based on a contention that grounds of attachment did actually exist[87] Where dissolution of the attachment is considered only as prima facie evidence that it was rightfully dissolved, dissolution of the attachment does not preclude an investigation of whether the attachment was wrongful in an action on the bond[88] The overruling of a motion to dissolve an attachment, made under a statute authorizing a motion to discharge for insufficiency of statement of cause or any other cause making it apparent of record that the attachment should not have been issued, or should not have been levied on a part or all of the property seized, is not such a judicial determination of the propriety of the attachment as to render the matter res judicata in a subsequent proceeding by the attachment defendant for damages caused by the wrongful attachment.[89]

c. Acts or Statements of Defendant in Attachment

Acts or statements of defendant which do not defeat liability on the bond are not a defense to an action thereon.

Of course, acts or conduct of defendant, which caused the injury complained of, are a defense to an action for damages caused by such injury.[90]

90. Purchase by himself

Where defendant in an attachment claims damages for the illegal issuing of the writ, one item of which is

It is no defense to an action on an attachment bond that defendant neglected to bond the property,[91] or was insolvent or suffering pecuniary embarrassment.[92]

While a debtor's consent to an attachment may not create a ground therefor, it is a complete defense to an action by him for wrongful attachment.[93] The mere fact that defendant agreed to a sale of the attached property before final judgment,[94] or, being present at the sale under attachment, consented that the balance of the proceeds, after satisfaction of the judgment and costs, should be applied on a mortgage held by the attaching creditor,[95] does not constitute a defense to the bond. An agreement to a sale of the attached property, to constitute a defense to an action on the bond, must amount to consent by defendant in attachment to a judgment on attachment, and, therefore, to a waiver by him of any damages caused thereby. Accordingly, a defendant in attachment proceedings who fails to assail the validity of the attachment or the truthfulness of the affidavit on which it is based, and who voluntarily executes a bill of sale of the attached goods for the use and benefit of plaintiff, the attachment thereupon being dismissed, ratifies the attachment proceedings and cannot thereafter proceed against the attachment plaintiff or the surety on the bond for damages claimed to have been sustained by reason of wrongful attachment.[96] On the other hand, it has been held that, if an agreement to a sale of the attached property amounted to consent by defendant to a judgment on the attachment, and, therefore, to a waiver by him of damages, this effect should have been given to it in the attachment proceedings by a judgment for plaintiff in attachment. Under such circumstances, where the agreement did not result in a judgment for plaintiff in attachment, it was held that the agreement could not afterward be relied on as a defense to a suit on the attachment bond.[97]

d. Ownership of Property

Ordinarily, the fact that the defendant in attachment was not the owner of the property seized will be a defense to an action for wrongful attachment.

It may be shown in defense to an action on an attachment bond that defendant in attachment was not the owner of the property levied on,[98] but the fact that, prior to the levy of attachment, defendant conveyed the legal title, is no defense where defendant retained the equitable title and a right to reconveyance.[99]

e. Good Faith and Probable Cause

Plaintiff's good faith in suing out a wrongful attachment is no defense in an action on the bond for wrongful attachment, but, under a permissive statute, probable cause may be a defense thereto.

If an attachment was in fact wrongfully sued out, the fact that plaintiff in attachment acted in perfect good faith furnishes no defense as against a recovery of the actual damages resulting therefrom.[1] Where, under the statute, a lack of probable cause for suing out an attachment is necessary to authorize a recovery therefor, the fact that there was probable cause for suing out the writ is, of course, a complete defense;[2] but, where the statutes allow a recovery if the attachment was wrongful, although probable cause therefor existed, the existence of probable cause for suing out the writ is no defense against a recovery of actual damages,[3] although it may avail to prevent a recovery of exemplary or punitive damages.[4] the alleged sacrifice of his goods seized and sold thereunder, and it appears that the low appraisement of the goods was procured by his own contrivance, and he was himself the purchaser of the goods at the sheriff's sale through a person interposed, and also concealed a part of the goods while under seizure, which in consequence were not included in the sale, he cannot recover—Yale v. Advice of counsel. The fact that the writ was sued out on the advice of counsel is under no circumstances a defense to a claim for actual or compensatory damages,[5] and, although advice of counsel may constitute a defense in so far as punitive or exemplary damages are claimed, it can have this effect only where it was based on a full and fair statement of the facts of the case,[6] and was followed in good faith.[7]

f. Defense Limited to Grounds of Affidavit

Ordinarily, the defendant cannot justify the attachment except on the grounds stated in his affidavit for attachment.

The general rule is that in an action for wrongful attachment the inquiry is limited to the grounds of attachment alleged in the affidavit, and if these are found not to exist or not to be sufficient, the existence of other grounds which are sufficient furnishes no defense;[8] but in Alabama the courts take the view that if any sufficient ground for attachment existed, the attachment is not wrongful and no actionable injury results therefrom, and hence, the rule is that the existence of any ground of attachment is a complete defense, even though such ground is different from that alleged in the affidavit.[9]

g. Return of Property or Proceeds of Sale

An offer to return, to be a defense, must be made in good faith, and with present ability to perform, and a credit for the proceeds of a sale of the attached property is no defense where the attachment defendant does not consent thereto.

To be effective as a defense to an action on an attachment bond, an offer to return the attached property must be made in good faith, and with present ability to perform.[10]

Defendant in an action on the bond cannot be permitted to show as a defense that his judgment in the attachment action allowed defendant therein credit for the proceeds of the sale of property attached, where such credit does not appear from the record to have been made with the consent of the debtor.[11] This rule is grounded in the policy of the statutes, to the end that the restraints imposed by statute to prevent abuse of process be not rendered useless, and that the remedy provided by statute be not a means of oppression.[12]

h. Other Levies

The fact that there are other levies on the property is no defense to an action on a bond for wrongful attachment.

It is no defense to an action for a wrongful attachment that other attachments were levied on the property of attachment defendant at the time of the attachment complained of.[13] This is true even where the prior claim is for more than the value of the property seized.[14]

§ 171. —— Jurisdiction and Venue

Generally, the court in which the attachment proceedings were instituted has jurisdiction of an action on the bond given in such proceedings, and an action may be maintained on a bond issued in another state

Ordinarily, the court to which an attachment is returnable has jurisdiction of an action on the attachment bond.[15] It has been held that in an action for the wrongful and malicious attachment of goods, the owner was not compelled to elect to sue the plaintiffs in attachment for the wrongful act independent of the bond, or sue them and their surety on the bond, but he might sue the plaintiffs in attachment independent of the bond and join the surety, and, having done so and demanded exemplary damages of such plaintiffs to a sum within the jurisdiction of the court, the surety could not successfully plead to the jurisdiction because his liability on the bond was less than the minimum sum for which the court has jurisdiction.[16]

Venue. It has been held that an action may be maintained on the bond in one state for the wrongful suing out of an attachment in another state.[17]

§ 172. —— Time to Sue and Limitations

Ordinarily, an action on the bond may be brought after final judgment in the attachment proceedings and within the statute of limitations.

Although an action on attachment bond may not be maintained, in some jurisdictions, until final judgment is had in the original action,[18] yet, where defendant in the original action recovered judgment for costs, which were paid, and an appeal was taken, the action on the attachment bond, brought pending appeal, is not premature, because such satisfaction of judgment terminates the original action.[19]

Where an attachment has been vacated prior to the institution of an action for damages for a seizure of property thereunder, such action cannot be considered as having been prematurely brought because, after it was commenced, the order vacating the attachment is vacated, the latter order being in turn vacated by a subsequent order.[20]

Since the statute of limitations begins to run from the time when the cause of action accrues, where the cause of action on the bond is deemed to accrue at the time of the seizure of the property, the statute runs from that time,[21] while if the right to proceed either on, or independently of, the attachment bond does not accrue until the dissolution of the attachment, or until the final determination of the main action, the statute will not commence to run until the happening of such event.[22]

§ 173. —— Parties, Process, and Appearance

a. Plaintiffs in general
b. Joinder of plaintiffs
c. Defendants

a. Plaintiffs in General

Ordinarily the defendant in attachment is the proper party plaintiff in an action on the bond

In accordance with the rules pertaining to actions on bonds generally, as discussed in the title Bonds § 106 [9 C.J. p 85 note 54 et seq], in the absence of a statute to the contrary the attachment defendant is the proper party plaintiff to bring action for damages resulting from a wrongful attachment, where such action is based on a bond running to him as obligee;[23] and, indeed, it has been held that, where the bond is taken in the name of the state to the use of attachment defendant, an action thereon may be brought by the attachment defendant in his own name.[24]

It is proper for the obligees to bring suit on the bond in the form in which they were named in the bond.[25]

b. Joinder of Plaintiffs

As a general rule, where there are several obligees in an attachment bond who have sustained injury because of the attachment, they should all join in an action thereon.

Where all the obligees named in the bond have a common interest and have sustained a joint injury, it cannot be doubted that they may join in an action on the bond,[26] and furthermore it is difficult to escape the conclusion that in such case they must join.[27]

If each obligee has sustained an injury in his own right, all the obligees may join in an action on the bond,[28] and it has been held that they must join;[29] irrespective of the fact that each obligee has employed different counsel to represent his respective interests and incurred separate counsel fees.[30] It has also been laid down without qualifications that in an action by one of two joint obligees on a bond to recover the full amount of the bond the other is a necessary party to the action.[31]

It has been held that where more than one obligee is named in the attachment bond, but all of the obligees named do not suffer injury by reason of the wrongful attachment, an action on the bond may,[32] and in some states must,[33] be brought in the name of all the obligees for the benefit of the obligee or obligees who have actually been injured; but there is also authority for the view that in such case the obligee or obligees who have actually sustained injury by reason of the attachment may sue on the bond without joining the obligee or obligees who have not been injured.[34]

Objection for defects of parties. If it appears from the complaint that all the obligees have not been joined as plaintiffs, the objection for this defect must be taken by demurrer, or it will be considered waived,[35] but if the complaint fails to show who are the obligees, and if the bond was in fact payable to others beside plaintiffs, objection may be taken to its introduction in evidence, or a variance may be claimed and proper charges requested.[36]

c. Defendants

Ordinarily the defendants in an action on the attachment bond are the obligors of such bond, the principal or surety, or both.

The parties to be sued on an attachment bond are, as in other cases, the obligors.[37] An action on an attachment bond may be brought against the principal alone,[38] or against the principal and sureties jointly.[39] There cannot, however, be two separate actions at the same time, one against the principal and another against the sureties; but one who attempts to prosecute such actions concurrently will be put to his election as to which one he will prosecute,[40] and it has also been held that an action cannot be prosecuted against the sureties alone to the exclusion of the principal if he desires to join therein.[41]

Where plaintiff in attachment did not execute the bond, he cannot, it has been held, be joined as a defendant in an action thereon, the mere fact that he is liable to the surety for any damage which the surety has suffered being insufficient to entitle him to be joined with the sureties,[42] but the view has also been asserted that the attachment plaintiff is a proper party to such an action notwithstanding he did not join in the bond sued on.[43]

Joinder of several attaching creditors. Where several creditors successively attach or otherwise impound the same fund of their debtor and give separate attachment bonds, they are not liable upon dismissal of their suits for a joint judgment for the damages resulting from the wrongful prosecution of their attachment suits. There is no joint tort by the several attaching creditors, no joint liability between the principals and sureties on the several bonds executed, and no connection between them at the time the attachments were sued out and the damage done.[44]

(a) As to Attachment Proceedings

In an independent action on the bond the plaintiff should allege the issue and levy of the writ of attachment.

Where an independent action is brought to recover for a wrongful attachment, the issue of the writ of attachment should be alleged;[46] but it has been held that where attachment defendant reconvenes on the attachment bond in the main action such allegation is unnecessary, since in pleading to a suit it is not necessary to aver the previous proceedings in the case, which appear to the court by the record.[47] Where an actual levy is necessary to a cause of action for wrongful attachment, such levy must of course be alleged,[48] but where a recovery may be had for the mere suing out of a wrongful attachment, even though there has been no levy thereunder, it is not necessary that a levy should be alleged.[49]

Beyond alleging the issue and levy of the writ in a proper case it is not necessary that the complaint in an action on an attachment bond should set out the proceedings in the attachment suit.[50]

(b) As to Wrongfulness

The petition should show that the attachment was wrongfully sued out.

Inasmuch as there can be no recovery for an attachment which is not wrongful, although the motive of the person suing it out may have been malicious, it must follow that the pleadings of attachment defendant must show that the attachment was wrongfully sued out.[51] It has been considered, however, that a general allegation that the attachment was "wrongfully" sued out is sufficient,[52] and it has also been held that a complaint alleging merely that the writ was "improperly" issued is insufficient.[53]

A dissolution of an attachment upon the merits being conclusive that it was wrongfully issued, it has been considered that, where the attachment was apparently dissolved on the merits, an averment in an action on the attachment bond that the suit was not prosecuted to effect and that judgment was rendered dismissing the attachment prevents any inquiry into the truth of the affidavit for attachment,[54] and the complaint in such an action should not deny the truth of the matters stated in the affidavit as grounds for the attachment.[55] However, since a dissolution of the attachment for irregularities or informalities does not establish that the writ was wrongfully issued, a mere statement that the attachment was dissolved does not show that it was wrongful.[56] An allegation that, on a trial on the merits, it was determined that nothing was due plaintiff amounts to an allegation that there was no ground for the attachment.[57]

(c) As to Property Affected

The declaration or complaint should describe the property seized under the writ of attachment.

The complaint in an action for wrongful attachment should describe the property levied on.[58]

(d) As to Bond

The plaintiff should set out the attachment bond, allege its due execution, and a breach of such bond

A complaint on an attachment bond should set out the bond,[59] and it must be alleged that the sureties joined in its execution,[60] and where plaintiff in attachment must join in the execution of the bond it would be insufficient to allege that he gave a bond to attachment defendant without alleging that he executed it.[61] It is not necessary, however, to allege that the undertaking was approved by the clerk who issued the writ,[62] and the authority of an agent

(1) It has been held that except where punitive damages are claimed, it is unnecessary to negative existence of any ground for attachment—Smith v. Summers, 112 So. 344, 215 Ala. 130.

(2) It has also been held that an allegation that an attachment was wrongfully sued out is insufficient where the petition fails to allege that no statutory ground existed for the issuance of the writ or that there was no debt due or to become due for which the attachment was sued out.—Irwin v. Cotney, 108 So. 235, 214 Ala. 415.

to execute a bond need not be alleged.[63]

Conditions and breach of bond. If an action to recover for wrongful attachment is brought on the bond, the declaration, petition, or complaint must set out the provisions or conditions of such bond,[64] and aver a breach of the conditions in plain terms,[65] stating the facts which constitute such breach.[66]

Setting Out Statute under Which Bond Given. A bond given in attachment proceedings in another state, having been taken by a court having jurisdiction of the subject matter, is good as a common-law bond, and it is not necessary to set out any statute under which it was taken in order to maintain an action thereon.[67]

(e) As to Want of Probable Cause

Where statutes make want of probable cause an element of the cause of action on the attachment bond, such want of probable cause must be alleged

Whether a want of probable cause for suing out the writ must be alleged in an action for wrongful attachment depends upon the provisions of the statute under which the action is brought and the character of damages sought to be recovered. Where, under the statute, a want of probable cause for suing out the writ is an element of liability for wrongful attachment, it is of course necessary to allege want of probable cause, even though only actual damages are sought, or the form of the proceeding is such that only actual damages are recoverable.[68] Where, however, actual damages may be recovered for a wrongful attachment notwithstanding there was probable cause for suing out the writ, there is no necessity for alleging a want of probable cause where the recovery sought is of actual damages only, whatever may be the character of the proceeding in which such recovery is sought.[69]

If exemplary or punitive damages are sought to be recovered, a want of probable cause for suing out the writ must always be alleged.[70]

(f) As to Malice

The plaintiff need not allege malice to recover actual damages.

If only actual damages are sought to be recovered in an action on the attachment bond for a wrongful attachment, it is not necessary to aver malice on the part of the attachment plaintiff in suing out the writ.[71]

Where exemplary or punitive damages are sought it is necessary to allege malice in the suing out of the writ.[72]

(g) As to Termination of Original Proceedings

If no cause of action accrues until the attachment has been dissolved, or until the termination of the principal action, such facts should be shown by appropriate allegations.

If no cause of action for a wrongful attachment accrues until the attachment has been dissolved, the fact of dissolution should be alleged in a direct action to recover for wrongful attachment.[73] If a final determination of the suit in which the attachment was sued out in favor of attachment defendant is essential to a cause of action for wrongful attachment, it is necessary to show this fact by some appropriate form of averment.[74]

(h) As to Damages

The plaintiff should allege that he sustained damages; and, where special damages are sought, he should specifically point out the special damage suffered

6 C.J. p 519 note 94.

74. Crandall v Rickley, 25 Minn. 119—6 C J. p 519 note 96.

It is necessary to allege that damages have actually been sustained in consequence of the wrongful attachment,[75] and if a recovery of special damages is sought such damages must be specially pleaded.[76] Accordingly, it has been held that without specially pleading such items of damage defendant in attachment could not recover for a depreciation in the value of the property seized under the attachment,[77] for attorney's fees expended in relation to the attachment,[78] for loss of credit,[79] or for expenses incurred in traveling to the place of trial.[80]

The allegations as to damages should be made with certainty and definiteness,[81] but it has been held that a count averring the falsity of the alleged ground for attachment and want of probable cause to believe in its truth is sufficient to warrant the award of punitive damages.[82] However, where the petition alleges special damages with sufficient definiteness to apprise the adverse party fully of the evidence which will probably be introduced, this is good against a general demurrer.[83]

If special damages are claimed on more than one ground, and if any of the damages are recoverable, a demurrer to the entire complaint is properly overruled.[84]

Allegations of an evidentiary nature are properly stricken out.[85]

Demand for damages. Where a demand for damages provided for in an attachment bond is necessary to give a cause of action on the bond, such demand must be alleged.[86]

Nonpayment of damages. In proceedings based on an attachment bond for injuries caused by the wrongful suing out of an attachment, it is necessary to allege that the damages have not been paid.[87] Where plaintiff fails to allege nonpayment of damages, it is, in some jurisdictions, held that the pleading is fatally defective,[88] but in other jurisdictions the petition will be deemed sufficient after verdict.[89]

(3) Joinder of Causes of Action

The plaintiff may bring one suit on two or more bonds.

A plaintiff may proceed in one action for damages for breaches of two or more attachment bonds executed by the obligor in his favor,[90] and it has been held that the owner of goods wrongfully attached is not compelled to elect to sue plaintiff in attachment independently for the wrongful act of the bond, or to sue him and his surety on the bond, but may sue plaintiff independently of the bond and join the surety, counting on the bond.[91]

(4) Reply or Replication

The plaintiff may reply to new matter relied upon by defendant which is not put in issue by plaintiff.

In accordance with the rules governing replies or replications generally, as discussed in the title Pleading § 186 [49 C.J. p 326 note 25], new matter which calls for a reply must be something relied upon by defendant, but not put in issue by plaintiff. Accordingly, where the petition, in a suit on an attachment bond, averred generally that plaintiff in the attachment had failed to prosecute his action without delay and with effect, and, further, that a judgment had been rendered for defendant in the transaction on a plea in abatement, an allegation in the answer that the attachment suit was still pending on a motion for a new trial and undisposed of set up no new matter requiring a replication [92] Where defendant in such an action sets up a judgment against the relator, a reply claiming that the judgment is exempt should not be stricken out [93]

b. Defendant's Pleading

General rules as to pleading govern the defendant's plea or answer in an action on an attachment bond.

In accordance with the rules governing pleas and answers generally, as discussed in the title Pleading § 106 et seq [49 C J. p 189 note 40 et seq], in an action on an attachment bond, defendant's plea or answer, to be sufficient, must with certainty allege all necessary facts to sustain the plea and must be responsive to the allegations of the declaration or complaint. Where the complaint alleges that plaintiff lost the use of the attached property for a stated time, allegations in the answer setting up the proceedings in the attachment suit, showing that plaintiff procured the release of the property shortly after it was seized, while not stating a complete defense, are relevant and material on the question of damages, and not subject to demurrer.[94] An answer in an action upon an undertaking given to procure an attachment which admits the making thereof, and, as to the other allegations, denies the same upon defendant's own knowledge, or his not having any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief in respect to the same, is insufficient, because of the impossibility of distinguishing the allegations denied upon knowledge from those denied for a want of knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief.[95]

Where the bond declared on has apparently been regularly executed, any defect in its execution must be raised by special, and not general, demurrer [96]

In an action by a mortgagor for a wrongful attachment of the mortgaged property, an answer setting up that the mortgagee has recovered judgment against attachment plaintiff for the conversion of the identical property and that such judgment has been paid, is demurrable as not affecting the mortgagor's right of action.[97]

Non est factum. Non est factum is a proper plea in an action on an attachment bond for a wrongful attachment;[98] but it has been considered that, if an answer setting up such plea is not verified by affidavit, the execution of the bond will be adjudged confessed.[99]

Non damnificatus. Non damnificatus is a good plea to a suit on an attachment bond, where the condition is that plaintiff in the attachment "shall pay all costs and damages which may be awarded against him, or sustained by any person by reason of his suing out said attachment."[1]

Payment Payment is a defense which must be alleged and proved in an action on an attachment bond [2]

c. Issues, Proof, and Variance

(1) Issues
(2) Proof
(3) Variance

(1) Issues

The issues are confined to those raised by the pleadings

In an action on an attachment bond, as in other actions, the issues are confined to those raised by the pleadings [3] The principal issue is usually whether the attachment was wrongfully obtained,[4] and the obligors on an attachment bond cannot question the sufficiency of the sheriff's return of levy.[5]

A plea of non est factum in an action on an attachment bond, in the absence of a plea traversing the breach of the bond alleged, puts in issue only the making of the bond described in the declaration or complaint [6]

(2) Proof

Every fact necessary to constitute a cause of action or a defense thereto must be proved, and otherwise proper evidence which tends to prove or disprove a fact in issue is admissible

In accordance with the rules governing proof in civil actions generally, as discussed in the title Pleading § 520 et seq [49 C.J. p 785 note 54 et seq] in an action on an attachment bond, every fact necessary to constitute a cause of action, or a defense, if in issue, must be proved by the party having the burden of proof thereof. For example, where depreciation is an element of damage sought to be recovered, plaintiff must show the market value of the property when taken and when returned.[7]

Also, otherwise proper evidence which directly proves or contradicts a fact in issue is admissible. Accordingly, under a plea of general issue or general denial it is proper to show a judgment on the merits in favor of attachment defendant in another action for the same cause,[8] that the proceeds of the sale of the attached property were credited to the attachment debtor in the original proceeding in order to reduce the amount of recovery to that extent;[9] or that attachment plaintiff stated the facts within his knowledge to his attorney before suing out the writ, and had been advised by him that the writ was authorized.[10]

Where the attachment defendant claims the value of the use of the attached property under his plea in reconvention for damages for wrongfully and maliciously suing out the writ, alleging that he was thereby deprived of its use, but the testimony tends to show that he was not so deprived thereof, plaintiff in attachment is entitled to the benefit of such proof without a special plea.[11]

Where the pleadings did not claim for time lost and expenses incurred in interviewing attorneys and the specified items of damage did not include such claim for damages, evidence of such damages was not admissible.[12] According to some authority, in an action on a bond conditioned to pay the attachment defendant all such damages as he may sustain by the wrongful or vexatious suing out of the attachment, defendant is not confined in his defense to proof of the existence of the particular ground of attachment averred in the affidavit, but may show the existence of any statutory ground.[13]

A general allegation of "injury to credit" is sufficient to authorize the introduction of evidence of a general loss of credit, but does not warrant evidence of special injury by loss of credit with particular persons.[14]

(3) Variance

The evidence adduced must conform to the allegations of the pleadings of the party by whom it is offered.

The evidence adduced in an action or proceeding for wrongful attachment must conform to the allegations in the pleadings of the party by whom it is offered,[15] although a slight variance may be disregarded as immaterial where the adverse party was not misled to his detriment.[16] Where the complaint in an action on an attachment bond fails to show who are the obligees, and the bond was in fact payable to others besides plaintiffs, objection may be taken to its introduction in evidence, or a variance may be claimed and proper charges requested.[17]

§ 175. —— Evidence

a Presumptions
b Burden of proof
c Admissibility
d. Weight and sufficiency

a. Presumptions

It will be presumed that the writ was regularly and properly issued.

In an action for wrongful attachment the presumption is that the writ was regularly and properly issued.[18] Accordingly, where the writ was issued, in an action on the bond it will be presumed that a proper affidavit was filed with the clerk, as he could not legally issue the warrant until an affidavit was filed, and the presumption is that every public officer has done his duty.[19]

Foreign attachment proceedings

(1) The regularity, validity, and freedom from defect of an attachment in a foreign state must be presumed in an action on an attachment bond—Elsman v Glens Falls Indemnity Co, 262 N.Y.S. 642, 146 Misc 631.

(2) In an action on an attachment bond given in another state, where it is shown that the court had jurisdiction of the subject matter, it will be presumed that the court had jurisdiction to issue the attachment, although no statute of that state authorizing attachment is pleaded.—Cunningham v. Jacobs, 22 N E. 335, 120 Ind 306.

19. Brown v Tidrick, 35 N W. 135, 14 S D. 249, 36 Am S.R 754.

b. Burden of Proof

The party suing on an attachment bond has the burden of proving every material element of his cause of action.

The party who seeks to recover damages by reason of an attachment against him has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the attachment was wrongful[20] by showing such facts and circumstances as tend to establish the truth of what he asserts[21] It is also incumbent upon him, where such matters are necessary to his recovery, to show want of probable cause for suing out the writ,[22] that there has been an actual levy upon his property,[23] and that he has been injured thereby[24] and the extent of such injury.[25]

Where a defendant counterclaims on the attachment bond in the original proceedings, he, of course, has the burden of showing a wrongful attachment.[26]

c. Admissibility

(1) In general
(2) As to probable cause
(3) As to malice
(4) As to quantity and value of property seized
(5) As to damages

(1) In General

The record in the attachment proceedings, the bond, and other evidence material to the cause of action or defense against the same is admissible in an action on the bond.

In a suit on an attachment bond the record in the original suit is admissible in behalf of plaintiff,[27] although it was not filed with the complaint,[28] and when illegible may be elucidated by parol evidence[29] Where, however, the action was for an unlawful taking of property under a warrant of attachment which was subsequently vacated, and after such vacation a second and valid warrant had been secured and placed in the hands of the officer who held the property and the property sold thereunder, it was held that the judgment roll, execution, and return of the officer were not competent either in defense or in mitigation of damages.[30]

Where defendant in attachment brought an action against the attachment plaintiff for wrongful attachment, to which action the sureties were not parties, a judgment for plaintiff therein is admissible against the sureties in an action on the bond to prove the fact of its existence and what was there decided[31]

Evidence may be introduced to show the relations of the parties, where material,[32] but evidence of payment on account made after levy is not admissible to show the status of the parties as of the date of the levy[33]

The deposition of the officer levying the attachment has also been held admissible for the purpose of showing what he did.[34]

The holding of the goods under other writs after one had been dissolved may be shown.[35]

In an action on an attachment bond to recover damages for a wrongful attachment it is competent to identify plaintiff as the real defendant in the attachment proceedings, doing business under the name of the obligee named in such bond[36]

Secondary evidence of the contents of the bond may be admitted when a proper foundation therefor is laid.[37]

(2) As to Probable Cause

Evidence concerning probable cause to believe there are grounds for attachment is admissible in an action on the bond, where want of probable cause is an element of the cause of action

Elimination of issue of set-off

In a suit on an attachment bond for wrongful and malicious attachment, the elimination of the issues presented by defendant's plea of set-off does not relieve plaintiff of the burden of proof resting upon him to show that he was damaged by suing out of the attachment—Hale v. 6 C.J. p 529 note 57.

37. Barnett v. Lucas, 61 N E. 633, 27 Ind App 441—6 C.J. p 524 note 64.

In proceedings to recover for injuries caused by wrongful attachment, facts and circumstances within the knowledge of attachment plaintiff, such as gave him reason to believe the truth of the facts stated in the affidavit, are competent evidence to show probable cause for suing out the writ;[38] but evidence of statements of third persons to attachment plaintiff as to defendant's conduct is not admissible, where there is no offer to prove that such statements were true or that plaintiff had reason to believe them to be so.[39] Evidence as to the conduct of attachment defendant's affairs and the good faith of his transactions is competent to prove want of reasonable cause.[40]

On an issue as to probable cause for suing out the writ, evidence as to the actual nonexistence of the grounds alleged is not competent.[41]

(3) As to Malice

Where malice is material to the cause of action, evidence tending to prove or disprove it is admissible.

It has been held competent for the purpose of proving malice to show that plaintiff in attachment procured two attachments in one week,[42] or to adduce evidence of attachment defendant's reputation for solvency and ability to pay his debts;[43] and where the debtors sued in attachment were a partnership it is competent to prove a wrongful levy of the attachment on the individual property of one of the partners, and attendant circumstances of aggravation, wantonness, or gross negligence, for the purpose of proving malice.[44] On the other hand, it is not permissible to show slanderous words or declarations of attachment plaintiff after the commencement of the action unless they relate directly to the act of suing out the attachment.[45]

Testimony to the effect the parties had "difficulty" on the day of the attachment and prior thereto is admissible on the question of bona fides or animus of the attaching creditor in procuring the attachment.[46]

Where exemplary or punitive damages are asked, attachment plaintiff should be permitted to show that he acted without malice,[47] and he may, for the purpose of showing absence of malice, introduce evidence of attachments against attachment defendant, levied prior to his own, provided he knew of them, but not otherwise,[48] that at the time of the suing out of the writ defendant in attachment was greatly involved in debt;[49] and that he acted on the advice of counsel, given on a full statement of the facts.[50]

(4) As to Quantity and Value of Property Seized

Evidence as to the quantity and value of property attached is admissible in an action on the bond.

It has been held that plaintiff may show that other goods than those designated in the sheriff's return were seized, whether the omission to inventory them was the result of fraud or mistake,[51] and that, although to determine the quantity of goods seized it is not competent to show the percentage of profits on goods sold, it is permissible to prove for this purpose the amount of goods on hand at any particular time, the quantity sold by way of diminution, and the stock with all additions made to it by accretions in the meantime.[52]

In determining the value of the property attached at the time of the attachment, it is competent to show what it brought at a sheriff's sale shortly after the seizure;[53] and an inventory of the stock of goods seized, made by defendant in attachment, is also admissible for this purpose.[54] Evidence on cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, who had been interested as purchaser of the goods subsequent to the attachment, tending to show that they were unsalable, is admissible on the question of damages, where it tends to show that the goods were of less value than claimed by attachment defendant.[55] A deputy sheriff who did not levy the attachment may testify as to the value of the goods, where a few days prior to the levy thereof he seized the same goods under a writ of detinue.[56]

Where cattle were attached, evidence as to what cattle are worth when located on and familiar with a range is admissible,[57] as is also evidence showing the condition and value of the cattle at times other than the day of their release.[58]

(5) As to Damages

Matters tending to show the amount of damage sustained by wrongful attachment are admissible in an action on an attachment bond.

Evidence of the amount of attachment defendant's business is admissible on the question of damages,[59] as is also evidence of loss of business.[60]

The judgment obtained against plaintiff in the attachment suit, if valid, is admissible on the question of damages.[61]

Where it is claimed that the seizure has caused injury because of the resulting inability to fulfill a contract of sale thereof, the contract may be proved by parol evidence on showing that it has been destroyed.[62] Plaintiff may not, however, testify as to the effect of an attachment on possible sales, not in the usual course of business.[63]

Injury to credit may be shown,[64] but attachment defendant cannot be permitted to testify that his credit was damaged in a designated amount, as extent of damage to credit is an inferential fact, which can be arrived at only by a weighing of all the facts and circumstances, and cannot be the subject of direct proof.[65]

It has been held that evidence that attachment defendant was a man of limited means is not admissible in his own behalf,[66] but it has also been held that proof of the financial inability of defendant in attachment to replevy the property seized is admissible in evidence to show his actual damage, and also his inability to minimize his damage.[67]

Where property has been wrongfully attached, it cannot be shown, in mitigation of damages, that the same goods were subsequently levied on and sold on execution in the satisfaction of a judgment outstanding against defendant in attachment.[68]

As to attorney's fees. In an action for wrongful attachment evidence is admissible to show the rendition of legal services in defeating the attachment suit[69] and the amount which defendant in attachment has paid or is bound to pay therefor, although not conclusive, is admissible.[70]

Minimizing damages. In an action for damages for detention of cars by attachment, defendant may show that plaintiff could, for a small sum, have secured a replevin bond, it being its duty to do what it reasonably could to lessen the injury,[71] but evidence of failure to mitigate damages is inadmissible where no duty to mitigate is shown.[72]

The deposition of the officer levying the attachment has been held admissible to show what he did and the nature of plaintiff's loss resulting from his store being closed under the attachment.[73]

d. Weight and Sufficiency
- (1) In general
- (2) As to wrongfulness and probable cause
- (3) As to malice
- (4) As to property seized.
- (5) As to damages

(1) In General

The party having the affirmative of an essential issue must sustain it by a preponderance of the evidence.

Following the rules applicable in civil actions generally, a party having the affirmative of an issue in an action on an attachment bond must sustain it by a preponderance of the evidence, and a preponderance of the evidence is sufficient.[74]

Proof of the wrongful attachment is sufficient to warrant a recovery of actual damages, without evidence of malice or want of probable cause, although the petition alleges that the writ was maliciously issued without probable cause.[75] Where the record shows that a final judgment in personam alone has been taken, this sufficiently shows a dissolution or abandonment of the attachment.[76]

A judgment in an action, in which the sureties were not parties, in favor of the attachment defendant against the attachment plaintiff for wrongful attachment, in which damages were recovered for wrongs committed by the principal apart from the attachment, is not of itself sufficient to establish a cause of action against the sureties on the attachment bond.[77]

Execution of the attachment bond is sufficiently shown by introducing the record of the attachment suit,[78] and where defendants interpose a verified plea of non est factum, which is the only issue in the case, proof of the execution of the bond by defendants is sufficient to entitle plaintiffs to recover.[79]

(2) As to Wrongfulness and Probable Cause

While proof sufficient to lead a reasonable man to believe that he had grounds for attachment is sufficient to show probable cause, a final determination of the attachment proceedings on its merits for the defendant therein conclusively proves that the proceedings were wrongful.

A dissolution of the attachment or judgment for defendant when upon the merits, is ordinarily conclusive, in a subsequent action or proceeding to recover damages caused by the attachment, that the writ was wrongfully obtained;[80] but an attachment cannot be held to have been wrongful, within the meaning of statutes authorizing a recovery of damages resulting from wrongful attachments, merely because it has been dissolved on account of defects in the form of the proceedings, or for mere omissions, irregularities, or informalities in the issue of the writ.[81] Neither does the fact that the attachment is dissolved or quashed for the failure of the officer to perform his duty,[82] or dismissal of the attachment because of the existence of prior liens on the attached property necessarily establish that the attachment was wrongful.[83]

Failure to prosecute to effect imports, prima facie, the want of a just cause of action.[84]

If the attachment proceedings are sustained, this may be conclusive that they were rightful,[85] although where plaintiff recovers judgment on the merits in the main action, and defendant may still sue because none of the statutory grounds for attachment existed or because the claim or levy was excessive, such termination cannot be conclusive that the attachment was rightful.[86]

A levy on exempt property does not tend to establish that the attachment was sued out wrongfully.[87]

87. Faroux v. Cornwell, 90 S.W. 537, 40 Tex.Civ.App. 529.

lieve that grounds existed for suing out an attachment requires evidence showing, not merely what the creditor in fact believed, but also what a reasonable man, on proper investigation, would believe.[88] The fact that the trial court granted judgment which, if unreversed, would have sustained the attachment has been held to be insufficient of itself to show probable cause and the fact that the appellate court in reversing such judgment stated in its opinion that the question was a perplexing one is not controlling on the question of probable cause[89]

The fact that an attachment was levied on exempt property does not warrant an inference that it was sued out without probable cause,[90] nor is the fact that judgment was rendered for defendant in the suit in which the attachment was issued, sufficient to establish that the attachment was issued maliciously and without probable cause[91]

The fact that plaintiff in attachment acted under advice of counsel has been held to be sufficient to show probable cause in suing out the writ.[92]

(3) As to Malice

Want of probable cause is not conclusive on the question of malice.

The fact that probable cause did not exist, although not conclusive, may support an inference of malice sufficient to supply the place of direct proof thereof.[93] However, malice cannot be presumed, as against sureties on a bond to procure an attachment, who are strangers to the controversy and not interested in the result, from the mere fact that they signed without previously examining into the merits of the cause;[94] nor can malice in suing out the writ be inferred from an unsuccessful attempt to show the existence of probable cause therefor.[95]

Even if, in an action for wrongful attachment brought independently of the attachment undertaking, the judgment roll in the attachment action, showing judgment for the attachment defendant, is admissible as prima facie evidence of want of probable cause, it is no evidence of malice in procuring issuance of the attachment[96]

Advice of counsel. The absence of malice is conclusively proved by evidence that plaintiff acted under the advice of counsel, and that during the litigation two judgments were rendered in his favor, although subsequently reversed[97]

Participation by a principal in the malice of his agent in suing out an attachment cannot be inferred merely from the relation of principal and agent.[98]

(4) As to Property Seized

The return of the officer is conclusive as to the quantity of goods seized.

It has been held that the return of the officer making the levy is conclusive as to the quantity of goods seized.[99]

(5) As to Damages

The fact of damage must be sustained by a preponderance of the evidence.

The fact of damage, as other material facts, must be established by a preponderance of the evidence[1] The evidence as to damages must be definite and

Rule stated

"It does not depend upon the state of mind of anybody, but upon the true facts of the case It is for the plaintiff in any such case, if there has been no previous adjudication, to lay before the jury the facts concerning his affairs sufficiently to show that, as they were known, or might have been known, by reasonable inquiry there were no fraudulent transactions on his part, and none upon which the ordinary business man would naturally look with suspicion"—Seattle Crockery Co. v. Insufficient evidence of depreciation

An award of five hundred dollars for depreciation of an automobile is not supported by testimony of witnesses where one expert who saw the machine before levy testified that it was then worth eight hundred and fifty dollars, while another who did not see it stated it was worth eleven hundred and fifty dollars, and plaintiff, sole witness on the value at its return, testified that he sold it for four hundred and fifty dollars and a lot of land which he valued at two hundred dollars, notwithstanding evidence of experts as to the rate of depreciation of an automobile while in use, where the automobile was not in use while in custody—Morneault v. National Surety Co., 174 P. 81, 37 Cal App. 285.

certain and should not leave it to the jury to speculate as to the damages sustained, and where the evidence is not definite and certain, plaintiff cannot complain that the jury fail to award him anything where defendant is awarded a sum in set-off [2]

The contract price,[3] or the amount actually paid,[4] for the services of defendant's attorney in proceedings for the dissolution of the attachment is not conclusive as to what is a reasonable compensation therefor. The record in the attachment proceedings is not conclusive, in an action on the bond, as to the ownership of the property seized, and the true status of title may be shown.[5] As the mere seizure of a debtor's book of accounts under a writ of attachment creates no lien in favor of the attaching creditor on the accounts, proof of such seizure is not proof of damages entitling plaintiff to judgment in an action on the indemnifying bond given in the attachment suit.[6] Where plaintiff testified that he employed a certain attorney to defend the suit and agreed to pay him a certain fee, but there was no proof that he defended it, or that plaintiff had paid or was liable for the fee, there was no evidence of actual damages.[7]

§ 176. —— Trial

a. Questions of law and fact
b. Instructions
c. Verdict or findings

a. Questions of Law and Fact

Where the evidence on an issue is undisputed, or where there is no evidence, the determination of the issue is a question of law for the court; but where the evidence thereon is conflicting, the issue should be submitted to the jury.

Where the evidence is conflicting, it is for the jury to decide whether the attachment was sued out wrongfully,[8] maliciously,[9] or without probable cause [10] It is also for the jury to determine whether injury resulted from the attachment,[11] and to determine the amount of damages to be recovered [12] The question of what facts constitute probable cause is for the court.[13] The question of the ownership is one of law and not of fact.[14]

It is the province of the jury, in some jurisdictions, to determine whether punitive damages will be awarded, as well as the amount thereof.[15]

Issues upon which there is no evidence should not be submitted to the jury. Thus, where there is no evidence tending to show probable cause,[16]

5. Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Co v U S Conservation Co, 132 S E 728, 31 Ga App 716.

Reason for the rule stated

"The title to the property seized under an attachment is not, as between the plaintiff in attachment and the defendant in attachment, a matter of inquiry in the attachment case If the defendant's property is not levied upon, the defendant has nothing to complain of If the property levied on is not the property of the defendant in attachment, this fact, so far as respects the attachment suit, is of no concern to the plaintiff. He is concerned therein only so far as he may be answerable to another person for trespass in causing the levy The record in the attachment case therefore cannot, in a suit for damages on the bond by the defendant in attachment against the plaintiff in attachment, establish anything as to the true title to the property attached"—Massachusetts Bonding & Ins. Attorney's fees

(1) The question as to the reasonableness of an attorney's fee for procuring dissolution of an attachment is one for the jury —McFarland v Ratcliffe, 9 P.(2d) 1090, 167 Wash. 673—6 C J. p 531 note 2 [b] (1).

(2) Where the attorney who defended the attachment suit testified as to the value of his services, and this evidence was not contradicted, it was the province of the jury to determine what constituted a reasonable fee.—St. John v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co, 182 P. 128, 56 Mont. 197.

(3) The attorney's fee to be awarded under a statute as costs of an action on a bond should be fixed by the court —McFarland v. Ratcliffe, supra

Rule stated

"If the facts are not in dispute, the question is for the court Upon disputed facts the jury must be left to pass, but the court must determine on the facts found whether or not probable cause existed As to what facts are sufficient to show probable cause is a question of law for the court, and whether such facts are proved by the evidence is a question for the jury"—McAllister v Hogue, 234 P. 657, 658, 133 Wash 664.

Failure to investigate or obtain advice

Where there is neither pleading nor proof to the effect that the creditor sought advice of counsel or exercised diligence to ascertain facts on which reasonable cause might rest, although the debtor, who was his or where there is no competent evidence of the value of an attorney's services,[17] such issues should not be submitted to the jury

Where the evidence leaves no doubt as to whether or not the attachment was wrongful, a verdict may be directed,[18] but where there is a judgment for defendant in the original action, and some evidence of actual damage, it is error to grant a nonsuit[19]

b. Instructions

The court should instruct the jury as to the law on all matters submitted to their consideration

The court should instruct the jury as to the law applicable to the matters presented for their consideration,[20] the elements and measure of damages,[21] and the manner in which the verdict should be returned,[22] being careful that the instructions shall not invade the province of the jury,[23] or be argumentative[24] or misleading[25]

c. Verdict or Findings

The verdict, if for plaintiff, should be in the amount of damages found to be sustained by plaintiff, not exceeding the amount of the bond

The rules governing verdicts in civil actions generally apply to actions on an attachment bond. Accordingly, the verdict, if for plaintiff on the bond, should be for the amount of damages found to be sustained by plaintiff, not exceeding the amount of the bond[26] A finding that nothing was due to plaintiff in attachment by reason of a counterclaim does not authorize an inference of malice in suing the writ such as will warrant an allowance of exemplary damages[27] A verdict contrary to the law and the evidence should be set aside and a new trial granted.[28]

§ 177. —— Judgment

The judgment in an action on an appeal bond must be in statutory form, and obtained in conformity with statutes

Where a statute requires that judgment be entered for the penalty of the bond, to be satisfied by the payment of the verdict and costs, a judgment for the payment of such verdict and costs rather than for the penalty, to be satisfied by the payment of such verdict and costs, will not be disturbed where a statute further requires that judgments shall not be reversed for mere technicalities not affecting the substantial rights of the parties[29]

Interest

In an action on an attachment bond, an instruction telling the jury that plaintiff was entitled to six per cent interest from the date the property was taken under a writ of attachment, was erroneous in not pointing out the effect of a return of part of the property on the right to recover interest —State ex rel and to Use of Kibble v First Nat. Bank, (Mo App) 22 S W (2d) 185

Loss of time and expenses

An instruction telling the jury that plaintiffs are entitled to recovery for the expenses and time that were necessary in the defense of the attachment suit, and which allows the jury to find for plaintiffs on this item, sufficiently informs the jury that the recovery could only be for loss of time, personal expenses, and printing bills that were necessary in the defense of the attachment Also, such instruction is not misleading because it omitted the word "reasonably" and used only the word "necessary"— State ex rel and to Use of Kibble v First Nat Bank, (Mo App) 22 S W (2d) 185

Property of defendant

The instructions should require the jury to find that the property taken under the writ of attachment belonged to plaintiff —State ex rel and to Use of Kibble v First Nat Bank, (Mo App) 22 S W (2d) 185

Punitive damages

"The jury should be given to understand by the trial court that the assessment of punitive damages as well as the amount, if so assessed, were matters resting in their sound discretion"—Blackmon v Gilmer, 130 So 192, 194, 221 Ala 554

Value of property

In an action on an attachment bond, an instruction permitting recovery for plaintiff, if the jury found that specific property had been taken under the writ, and restricting the amount of damages to the reasonable fair market value of such property not to exceed a certain sum, which was the value of the property as alleged in the petition, was not erroneous as allowing the jury to return a verdict for damages up to the full amount sued for rather than the amount shown by the evidence — State ex rel and to Use of Kibble v. First Nat Bank, (Mo App) 22 S W (2d) 185

22. Cross v Coffin-Fletcher Packing Co, 51 S E 704, 123 Ga 817

Interest on value of property

An instruction that the jury might allow interest "on all property that was taken and not returned" is sufficient as limiting the jury to a calculation of the interest upon the property that was taken and not returned, and it was not misleading in failing to require the jury to calculate the interest upon the value of the property —State ex rel and to Use of Kibble v First Nat Bank, (Mo App) 22 S W (2d) 185

Under a statute providing "that no greater amount shall be recovered of the said securities, than the appraised value of the property seized by the officer," the court, on a verdict for a greater amount in an action on the bond, should render judgment against the principal and sureties for the appraised value, and against the principal for the balance.[30]

Where it is alleged in the complaint in an action on an attachment bond that application was made for a warrant of attachment and that such warrant issued, it will be presumed, in support of a judgment for plaintiff, that a proper affidavit was filed with the clerk.[31]

A judgment may be rendered against the surety alone where service has not been obtained on the principal.[32]

§ 178. —— Appeal and Error

Appeals in actions on attachment bonds are controlled by rules applicable in other actions which have been discussed in the title Appeal and Error Cases of peculiar application to actions of this character, if any such may arise, will be treated in the Pocket Parts, under this section number.

§ 179. —— Damages

a. Actual or nominal damages
b Exemplary or punitive damages
c. Elements or items of damage d Mitigation of damages
e. Amount of allowance
f. Set-Offs

a. Actual or Nominal Damages

A defendant in attachment who brings an action on the bond for wrongful attachment, upon proof that the attachment was wrongful, is entitled to recover his actual damages, and, in the absence of proof of actual damages, he is at least entitled to nominal damages.

In an action on a bond for the wrongful suing out of an attachment, if the attachment is shown to be wrongful and that plaintiff is entitled to recover, he is entitled to recover his actual damages,[33] by which is meant compensation[34] for those injuries and losses which are the direct and proximate result of the wrongful suing out of the writ and the seizure and detention of his property thereunder.[35]

Nominal damages. Where an attachment is wrongfully sued out but no actual damages have resulted, attachment defendant is nevertheless entitled to recover nominal damages.[36] Under these circumstances, however, he can recover nothing more.[37]

b. Exemplary or Punitive Damages

(1) Right to recover
(2) Under what circumstances allowable
(3) Actual damages as basis of recovery

(1) Right to Recover

In the absence of statutory permission, punitive damages are ordinarily not recoverable in an action on an attachment bond.

As a general rule the liability on the attachment bond is limited to the actual damages which defendant in attachment has sustained by reason of the wrongful suing out of the writ, and punitive or exemplary damages cannot be recovered thereon, whether the proceeding is by independent action on the bond or by an assessment of damages in the main action.[38] Where, however, the statute permits exemplary or punitive damages where the attachment was malicious as well as wrongful, such damages are proper,[39] and under some statutes recovery for punitive damages may be had against the principal on the attachment bond, but not against his surety.[40]

(2) Under What Circumstances Allowable

Where punitive damages are recoverable in an action on the bond, there must be proof of malice.

Under statutes permitting the recovery of exemplary or punitive damages such damages may be allowed for a wrongful attachment where the writ was sued out without probable cause and plaintiff in attachment acted maliciously in the premises.[41] In order to warrant such a recovery the element of malice[42] or, what imports the same, want of probable cause to believe that grounds for attachment existed, or wanton action,[43] must be present, and there can be no recovery beyond actual damages where the attachment was sued out in good faith and was merely wrongful.[44]

(3) Actual Damages as Basis of Recovery

Exemplary or punitive damages cannot be awarded unless actual damages are also awarded.

Where defendant in attachment fails to show that he is entitled to recover any actual damages because of the wrongful suing out of the writ, he cannot recover exemplary damages therefor, even though the writ was maliciously sued out;[45] and where plaintiff remits the actual damages the court has no power to render a judgment for exemplary damages.[46]

c. Elements or Items of Damage

(1) In general
(2) Loss, destruction, or conversion of property
(3) Injury to, or depreciation of, property
(4) Loss of use of property
(5) Injury to business
(6) Loss of profits
(7) Injury to credit
(8) Injury to reputation or feelings
(9) Loss of time
(10) Interest
(11) Costs
(12) Expenses of litigation

(1) In General

The items of damages recoverable in an action on a bond for wrongful attachment are those caused by the wrongful levy of attachment.

In accordance with the rule, that the recovery of actual damages is limited to compensation for injuries which are the direct and proximate result of the wrongful attachment, it has been held that no recovery can be had from inability to raise a crop,[47] for expenses incurred to prevent additional levies,[48] for damages arising from the taking of property before the attachment suit was begun,[49] or from seizure under a writ in detinue by attachment plaintiff, which suit was dismissed before suing out the attachment.[50] Neither are any damages recoverable against the sureties on the attachment bond for wrongs committed by the principal apart from the attachment.[51] Where a fund already in custodia legis is impounded by a wrongful attachment, the receiver's compensation for loaning the fund pending litigation, which was retained out of the growing interest, does not constitute an element of damage recoverable upon a breach of the attachment bond.[52] A levy of attachment on books of account is not a levy on the debts represented by the books, but only on the materials composing the books, and does not prevent the person to whom such debts are due from collecting them, so as to make such prevention an element of damage.[53]

Damages are not recoverable for a voluntary bankruptcy to which the attachment may have contributed,[54] although they are allowed for the period beginning with the wrongful attachment and ending with the filing of such voluntary petition in bankruptcy.[55] Where the bond is conditioned to pay all damages which may be adjudged against plaintiff in consequence of his failure to prosecute his suit to effect, where a receivership of the property was made necessary by the attachment, the amount of the receiver's compensation and expenses are recoverable under the bond on plaintiff's failure to prosecute the suit to effect.[56]

Plaintiff cannot recover for injuries resulting from the levy of executions by other creditors in consequence of the attachment,[57] nor can he recover expenses involved in preventing additional levies.[58]

Where property was wrongfully attached, the owner, who promptly sought release of the levy, can recover damages resulting from the levy between the date of the levy and the date of the release, regardless of whether the levy was valid, as the only remedy of the owner was to submit to the levy and to ask its release by the court.[59]

Necessary business expenses. It has been held that, where the stock in trade of a druggist was wrongfully attached, the rent of the building in which the business was carried on, for the time during which the goods were in custody, for which the druggist was liable, was recoverable from the attaching creditor.[60]

(2) Loss, Destruction, or Conversion of Property

The plaintiff in an action on the bond may recover for the loss, destruction, or conversion of his property occasioned by the wrongful attachment.

Where property wrongfully attached has been lost, destroyed, converted or sold, or for any reason cannot be returned to or recovered by defendant in attachment, he is entitled to recover, as actual damages, the value of the property at the time and place of the seizure,[61] with interest on such value from the time of the seizure[62] to the time of the trial[63] or of the rendition of the judgment.[64] Where, however, the conversion occurs while the property is in the custody of the attaching officer, the value of such property cannot be recovered in an action on the bond.[65]
